

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 9, 1864.

THE stat. 26 & 27 Vict. c. 122, enabling the Crown to make a redistribution of the circuits of the judges, has been put in force. By an Order of the Queen in Council, bearing date the 11th December, 1863, the county of York and the county of the city of York, have been taken from the Northern Circuit and annexed to the Midland Circuit; while the counties of Leicester, Rutland, and Northampton, have been taken from the latter and added to the Norfolk Circuit; and, as a necessary companion to these alterations, by another Order in Council of the same date, the number of revising barristers for the Northern Circuit, which, by the Registration of Voters Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 28, was fixed at fifteen, has been reduced by six, while the number on the Midland and Norfolk Circuits have been raised respectively from eleven to fourteen, and from eight to eleven. Whether these changes are to be the sole fruits of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 122, remains to be seen; in any event we hail them as a salutary act of justice to the community, which has been only too long delayed.

The kingdom of England is divided into six circuits, and the most superficial glance at the map will shew how extremely unequal was the division. The Northern Circuit comprised the six counties of York, Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancaster, covering a space of more than one-fourth part of the kingdom, and containing, according to the census of 1861, a population of about five millions and a half.

Taking, according to the same census, the population of England at nineteen millions (strictly 18,954,444), we shall see that the population of the Northern Circuit includes between one-third and one-fourth of the whole, leaving about thirteen millions for the five other circuits, and the densely peopled metropolitan county. And not only did the Northern Circuit cover this enormous expanse of country, and boast a large agricultural population, but within its ambit were situated some of the richest and most populous manufacturing towns in the kingdom—Manchester, Sheffield, Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, Blackburn, Rochdale, &c., and though last, not least, Liverpool, the assizes at which teem with mercantile causes of the greatest weight, importance, and difficulty. To despatch (for no other expression seems adequate to the occasion) the business of this enormous circuit, and that, too, within a limited time, two judges were sent, while as many were allowed to each of the other circuits; including, among the rest, the Midland, containing the counties of Derby, Leicester, Lincoln, Northampton, Nottingham, and Warwick; and the Norfolk, containing those of Cambridge, Huntingdon, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Bedford. Nor was this all. In choosing the circuits, the Northern Circuit generally fell to the lot of the junior judges, who were compelled to take whatever circuit was left unappropriated by their seniors. Now, it is certain, that in the occupation of a judge, be the knowledge, talent, patience, or integrity of the individual what they may, the old rule, "practice makes perfect," holds true,—no junior judges can be expected to get through the business of a circuit as effectively as those whom experience has rendered expert in it. We have not the least doubt, that owing to all the above-mentioned causes, the business on the Northern Circuit was not dealt with as it ought to have been, and that, without meaning to cast the slightest imputation on the learned and able judges who have presided upon it, very much injustice must have been done there every year—not so much, perhaps, in the shape of positive misdecision, as from the desire to get through causes, trying them only half, i. e. after having heard only a portion of the evidence, directing in haste a verdict for one party or the other, with leave reserved to the loser to move the Court above to set it aside. On coming before that Court, it is discovered, what, allowing twenty minutes more time at the assizes would have shewn, that the real question between the parties was not reached; and consequently the party against whom the verdict was given must either submit to injustice, or incur the risk and expense of a new trial.

We must not, however, dissemble from ourselves, that while these salutary changes will greatly benefit the public, as well as the fortunes of individual members of the profession, they will be productive of loss and inconvenience to other members of it. For this, however, there is no remedy. It is the necessary incident of all change to produce partial evil, which must be disregarded when the effect of the change is to produce general good; and the opposing reforms, on the ground of the partial evil they thus inevitably produce, would be to shut the door for all time against every species of improvement.

MILITARY LAW.

It has been said of slavery, that its presence is ever more deleterious and corrupting to the masters than the slaves: that the effect of such absolute power is more ruinous to the character of its possessors than of its victims. Recent disclosures lead us to think that something of this kind, differing, we admit, greatly in degree, may be predicated of the possession of military authority.

Those of our readers who have had sufficient curiosity and diligence to follow the slow length of the Crawley court-martial, will have little difficulty in discovering the occasion of these remarks. That court-martial is over, and it has proved, as indeed it must have been, from the moment that the "articles of accusation" were published, evident that it would prove a failure and a sham. We do not mean by this to find any fault with the finding of the court; on the contrary, we are clearly of opinion that no other conclusion could have been arrived at on the evidence; but our complaint is one of which we trust the country has not yet heard the last; it is this—that the real question to which the country demanded a reply, was, studiously or inadvertently, at any rate effectually, withdrawn from the consideration of the court. The court was required to decide—first, whether Colonel Crawley had or had not treated the deceased sergeant-major with wilful and improper harshness during his arrest; and, secondly, whether he had or had not falsely attempted to shift the blame of such harshness from his own shoulders to those of a subordinate; and those questions they, necessarily, as we think, answered in the negative: but what the public desired to know involved much higher and more important considerations, namely, whether a man, known to be innocent, whose innocence his accusers did not dare to question in the only legitimate way, by bringing him to trial, had or had not, nevertheless, for sinister motives, connected with the trial of another, been deliberately retained in an unjust imprisonment, the effect of which had been to cause his death; and if so, who was responsible for the crime; and to these questions the late court-martial did not, and from its constitution could not return any answer.

But although the issue which alone was of sufficient importance to justify the popular excitement was thus excluded, and much evidence directly bearing thereon has, doubtless, been lost, there has been incidentally revealed, in the course of this remarkable trial, enough to fill with wonder and dismay the minds of all who have any true love for the principles of personal liberty. We do not, and will not, believe that there is a civilian in the land who read the letter of the 6th May, 1862, which was published in the course of these proceedings, without a thrill of horror and astonishment; horror, that such things could take place under British rule, and astonishment, that such an officer of character and distinction, who has been deservedly advanced by her Majesty to a place of high power and trust, could have been so blinded to the plainest principles of natural justice, as to write or sanction so extraordinary an order.

That there may be no mistake regarding the terms of the letter in question, we give it in extenso:—

"Deputy Adjutant-General's Office, Head Quarters, Mahabeshwur.

"May 6, 1862.

"From the Deputy Adjutant-General, Her Majesty's British Forces, to Major-General Farrell, commanding Mhow Division.

"Sir,—The inclosed, No. 1374, has been carefully dictated by the Commander-in-Chief, on the assumption that no further matter has transpired against the non-commissioned officers concerned. If, however, they have been summoned in Captain Smales's defence, and Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley is of opinion that a charge of perjury can be established against any of them, or of conspiring in any manner, a further reference should be made, and the inclosed letter should not be communicated. His Excellency observes, that the best plan will be to send for Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley, and beg him to read the inclosed very carefully, and then to say, if other circumstances have transpired rendering the communication of the inclosed inexpedient. His Excellency is most anxious to support the discipline of the regiment, and its commanding officer's authority; but to insure that, it is absolutely necessary that no prosecution should be instituted in this matter, of which there may be a chance of failure. If the non-commissioned officers are released, as proposed by his Excellency, Sir William Mansfield would recommend Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley to make a short but very kind address to them, and to point out, that if any of them had felt hurt, and more especially the regimental sergeant-major, their right way of proceeding would have been, to have requested to be allowed to speak to him on the subject—a request which, his Excellency is convinced, would not have been made in vain. In conclusion, I am to request that the sergeant-majors concerned are not to be released from arrest, or the inclosed letter acted upon, until the proceedings in the trial of Captain Smales are entirely closed, and the court, of which Lieutenant-Colonel Payne is president, has been finally adjourned.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"FREDERICK THESIGER, Lieut.-Col.

"Acting D. A.-G., Her Majesty's British Forces."

The inclosure referred to in this letter is also a letter addressed by Colonel Thesiger, as acting Deputy Adjutant-General, to General Farrell, and it opens with this plain admission:—"I am desired by the Commander-in-Chief to remark, that there does not appear, as shewn by these documents, to be any sufficient grounds for bringing the non-commissioned officers concerned to trial for conspiracy."

The whole letter will be found in The Times of the 19th November, 1863.

Now, taking these two letters together, and recollecting that the inclosure may be looked upon as an order from the Commander-in-Chief, and the letter in which it was inclosed, as secret instructions with regard thereto, they appear to us to be capable of but one construction. "The men," says Sir William Mansfield, or Colonel Thesiger as his deputy, "are innocent; you must not attempt to prove them guilty, for you will certainly fail; but for all that, you must not set them at liberty, for fear that the result of your doing so would be to affect the decision about to be pronounced on a third party."

What would be said if we had next week to report that the magistrates in petty sessions in some country village, when certain persons, "known to the police," had been brought before them on a charge of some crime, unsupported by any sufficient evidence, had said to the constable, "There is clearly no evidence against these men, and we cannot possibly commit them for trial; but for all that you must not discharge them till after John Smith, who has been already sent up for trial at the next assizes, has been tried, and the judges have left the county?"

Does any one doubt that the magistrates in question would be removed from the commission? If one of the prisoners were to die under circumstances which led to the suspicion that his death had been caused, or hastened, by the illegal imprisonment, is there any doubt that the magistrates, and the constables who obeyed their orders, would be liable to indictment for manslaughter?

But then, it will be said, the exigences of military law justify many things which would admittedly be indefensible among civilians. That may be so; but what we desired to learn from the court-martial on Colonel Crawley was, whether, according to existing military law and usage, this particular instance comes within that rule; and on this point we are left in our former ignorance.

If the law under which our soldiery live does not sanction the deliberate imprisonment of innocent men for collateral purposes, then we will not trust ourselves to express our opinion of the conduct of Sir William Mansfield, and those who acquiesced in his orders in this matter. If it does sanction such conduct, then we have no hesitation in saying, that the existence of such a law is a disgrace to a civilised community, and a Christian land, and is abhorrent to the feelings and principles of a free and liberty-loving nation.

We admit that it is necessary for the due maintenance of military discipline that many things should be criminal in a soldier which would be innocent in a civilian; that he should be subjected to a class of restraints from which others have been emancipated on leaving school, and be liable to be punished for actions which in others would be rather meritorious than the contrary. But however minute may be the regulations to which the soldier is subjected, however stringent the law by which he is to be judged, the plainest principles of reason and justice demand, that if he conform to all these regulations, and keep himself within the commands of that law, he shall not be liable, without a crime, to imprisonment at the arbitrary will of a third person—an imprisonment which, if legal for one day longer than is necessary for the purpose of duly bringing the case to trial, may be indefinitely prolonged, and which, therefore, involves the exercise of an authority not formally claimed, since the fall of the Bastille, even by the most despotic sovereigns. Granted that the ex-King of Naples and his father in practice exercised such a power—granted that something of the kind has been known to take place in Poland—the precedents are hardly such as we should readily consent to follow; and even then we do not know that it was ever avowed that the prisoners were to be detained without trial and conviction.

We do not think it necessary to discuss the question, whether, supposing Sir William Mansfield's order to have been illegal, when judged by military law, the fact that such an order had been given would or not constitute a sufficient defence for Colonel Crawley's obedience of it. The principle of "respondere superior," though it certainly would not extend to such a case as between civilians, is admittedly of much wider application in military matters; and although we believe that it never has been recognised by any competent authority that the order of a superior officer, manifestly illegal on the face of it, is a sufficient protection to the inferior who obeys it; and although in certain cases connected with riots and other civil disturbances, the direct contrary has been frequently declined, still, where there is any doubt upon the question, and especially where the matter affects no one not bound to military subjection, we think it probable that the defence would be valid.

We repeat, that in the proceedings of this most unhappy trial, we have no fault to find with the parties immediately concerned: not with the prosecutor, who seems to have instituted a most searching investigation into the only questions on which he was permitted to enter; not with the prisoner, who conducted his defence with singular ability, judgment, and good taste; not with the court, which could not possibly, in our opinion, have come to any other conclusion than it did; but we do complain most loudly, in the interests of law, justice, and humanity, of the omission, whether designed or not, from the articles of accusation, of the only charge which could have enabled the court really to investigate the true ground of offence—the only issue of sufficient national consequence to justify either the excitement felt by the public; or the expenditure lavished on the trial; and it is because of this omission that we feel compelled to say, that, viewed as a concession to the public demand for an inquiry, the Crawley court-martial has been an expensive and transparent sham.

THE REPORTING SYSTEM.

In our article of the 26th December, 1863, on the duties of the committee appointed at the meeting of the Bar in Lincoln's-inn Hall to inquire into the reporting system, we referred to the statement made at that meeting by Mr. Daniel, that the cause of the cessation of the Year Books in the 27 Hen. 8, was to be found in the rapacity of that monarch, who wanted for other purposes the money which had been set apart for the salaries of the reporters; adding, that no authority was cited for this assertion, and we were not in a condition either to confirm or refute it. Mr. Daniel has since informed us that he is under the impression that he cited an authority for it; but, be this as it may, the authority on which he relies is the work of Mr. John William Wallace, an American writer, intitled "The Reporters, chronologically arranged," 3rd ed., Philadelphia, 1855, which may be seen in the library of Lincoln's-inn. The passage, which is at p. 75, runs as follows:—"The Year Book of Hen. 8, particularly after the twelfth year of that king, is said to be inferior to any of the Year Books which preceded it—a fact which is attributed to the very sufficient cause, that the stipend which had been paid in former reigns was dropped in the time of Hen. 8." It is worthy observation, that in the preceding page we are informed, and truly, that there is no Year Book of that reign previous to the twelfth year. "The only years of Hen. 8 are the 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 26, and 27." Neither does Mr. Wallace cite any authority for the position here advanced; and it is impossible to accept, as authority on such a subject, the ipse dixit of a person, and that, too, a foreigner living nearly 250 years after the event.

Having thus had occasion to refer to the treatise of

Mr. Wallace, we take the opportunity to direct attention to his testimony on another important matter connected with the subject of reporting, namely, the value of the American reports at the present day.

In p. 11, he says:—"Reporters nowadays make reporting a particular study: they follow the courts regularly, take notes for the purpose, examine the record, and prepare the case." But he adds in a note—"Some of them, I mean. I should be sorry to lay such things to the charge of some gentlemen who of late have undertaken the office of reporters; things certainly, that they know not of."

The next sentence gives Mr. Wallace's view of the security possessed by the American public for the accuracy of reports in that country. "They, i. e. the reporters, obtain the original written opinions of the Court, often submit the report to counsel and the Court, and the volumes appear so soon after the decision they record, that if any error should exist, it could scarcely fail to be corrected." We should like to ask a few questions here. Suppose, in America, a case is complained of as misreported, in respect either of omission or commission, what power exists to compel the reporter to acknowledge and amend the error? And if he admits its existence, how is the evil remedied? Is he compellable, at the expense either of the State or himself, to cancel the sheets or leaves, as the case may be, of peccant matter, replace them by others, and withdraw from circulation the uncorrected copies of the report? On all these subjects, we expect to be enlightened by the committee now sitting.

As connected with the subject of "reports, reporting, and reporters," we find a pamphlet with the above title, published by a member of the bar, Mr. Almaric Rumsey, of Lincoln's-inn, in the shape of "an address to the gentlemen of the junior bar on the present crisis." The following are the views advocated by him, put into the form of a resolution:—

"That a reform in the system of reporting is urgently required.

"That it is desirable that a digest or revision of old reports be made, as suggested by the Lord Chancellor in his speech in the House of Lords on the 12th June last.

"That existing interests should, as far as possible, be respected.

"That a staff of barristers should be provided to report and digest the cases for each current year or other stated period, and that, after the publication of the volume or volumes for such year or other stated period, no other reports for such year or other stated period should be cited.

"That until the publication of such volume or volumes, any other reports should be cited as at present.

"That a staff of barristers should be provided for the digest or revision of old reports, and that, after the publication of any portion of such digest or revision, no other reports for the period comprised in such portion should be cited.

"That until the publication of such portion, any other reports should be cited as at present.

"That in forming the staff for reporting and digesting cases, and the staff for digest or revision of old reports, a preference should be given to such barristers as shall, at the time of forming such staffs respectively, be employed either on the authorized or on the unauthorized reports.

"That all barristers so employed, who cannot be placed on either of such staffs, should receive pecuniary compensation, to be calculated on actuarial principles.

"That no sufficient power exists in the bar to forbid the citation of any current or old reports, or to carry out any arrangement for pecuniary compensation, and that these objects cannot be obtained without the assistance of Parliament.

"That a memorial be presented to the Lord Chancellor, requesting him to introduce a bill to carry out the above-mentioned objects."

[V. & R. Stevens, Sons, & Haynes. 1863.]

MR. PHILLIPS'S work is at once an able law book, and a lucid treatise, in a popular form, on the rights of authors and artists. The wants and interests of the legal practitioner are consulted by a careful collection and discussion of all the authorities, while the non-professional reader will find in the book a well written and perfectly intelligible statement of the law upon the matters of which it treats. It may be questionable whether there are many subjects with which it would be practicable to deal in this satisfactory manner. If copyright were not to such an extent the creature of statute, it would scarcely have been possible to treat of it popularly in any other than the brief but bewildering form of a "handy-book." But as the decisions of the Courts are, for the most part, mere expositions of the different statutes, the cases require no depth of technical knowledge, and little more than an attentive perusal for their apprehension.

It is no longer a matter of other than pure anti-quarian interest to consider whether or not there was copyright at common law. The question, without being decided, was set at rest by the great case of Miller v. Taylor (4 Burr. 2303). The reasons for and against the existence of the right, independently of statute, are very well stated by Mr. Phillips, at p. 45. It is pretty certain, that if the Legislature had not interposed, by the Statute of Anne, to substitute a statutory for a judicial determination of the question, the judges would ultimately have arrived at a conclusion in favour of the right as a subject of property at common law. In truth, there seems no sound reason why inventions of the mind, which are worth money, should be less protected by the law than the products of mere mechanical skill; and it is clear from the arguments and judgments in Miller v. Taylor, that the judges, with one or two very distinguished exceptions, were disposed to take that view. If the common law had been permitted to obtain its natural development on the subject, it might, indeed, have become necessary to appeal to the Legislature to set a limit to the duration of the exclusive right to reproduce, but we should have been spared a great part of the fragmentary and voluminous legislation on the subject. The law would have been more accessible and portable than it is at present,—scattered over some twenty statutes, from the 8 Ann. c. 19, down to the 26 Vict. c. 68, and occupying nearly a hundred closely-printed pages of Mr. Phillips's book.

Mr. Phillips divides his subject into two heads—viz. copyright before, and copyright after, publication. "They are," the author observes, "distinct and several rights. Copyright before publication is the more ancient of the two. It is the exclusive privilege of first publishing any original and material product of intellectual labour. Its basis is property; a violation of it is an invasion of property, and it depends upon the common law; the privilege is simply a right of user incidental to the property, exclusively vested in the absolute and lawful possessor of the material product. The right exists in every unpublished innocent production of art, literature, or science."

The author cites, and comments upon, two recent decisions, which contain a very full discussion of the law on this part of the subject. (Prince Albert v. Strange, 2 De G. & S. 652; 1 Mac. & G. 25; Turner v. Robinson, 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 121, 510). The latter of these cases suggests the difficulty of defining what publication is, in the sense that renders it an abandonment by the author of his right of property in the product of his intellect. It was decided, in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, that there had been no publication of a picture which had been sold by the artist for the purpose of being engraved, and had been exhibited in public in several towns in the United Kingdom. This view of the law is certainly inconsistent with that put forward by Mr. Phillips in his first chapter; but we must not be understood, nevertheless, to express any dissatisfaction with the learned author's conclusions.

With reference to copyright after publication, the author explains his treatment of the subject as follows (p. 47):—"Admitting copyright after publication at the present day to be simply a creature of statute law, its nature, extent, and operation must, of course, be examined by reference to that law. By several acts of Parliament, this exclusive privilege has been conceded to workmen in many different fields of mental labour; to various artists as well as to the composers of literary and musical works; but unfortunately, though the several acts have a certain degree of family likeness to each other, their features are so far dissimilar, that the law regulating copyright, in the various offspring of the busy brain, must be looked for in many scattered pages of the statute book. The only safe path in the further consideration of copyright law now seems to be, to adhere to the course taken by the Legislature, and so separately to treat of the privilege as it exists in the several subjects to which it extends." Accordingly, the author proceeds to treat in order, of copyright in literary and musical works; in the representation of dramas and musical compositions; in public lectures; in engravings; in paintings, drawings, and photographs; in sculpture, and the application of designs.

The history of the law of copyright in paintings is the subject of an interesting and well-written chapter (c. 9). The author mentions a curious, but by no means exceptional, instance of the error into which a great legal functionary may fall who is tempted to hazard an opinion on what the law should be, instead of restricting himself to pronouncing what it is. In De Berenger v. Whible (2 Stark. 548), Abbott, C. J., declared, that "it would destroy all competition in art to extend copyright to painting." "Many eminent artists," says Mr. Phillips, "thought differently;" and fortunately the late Lord Lyndhurst took a wiser view of the matter than Lord Tenterden. In 1858 a petition was presented by him to the House of Lords, and a committee appointed to consider the complaints of artists; but Parliament was dissolved before any bill could be considered. It is probable that no legislation would have taken place for some time to come, if it were not for the clamour of the photographers, who made up in number for what they lacked in importance, and who succeeded in 1862 in obtaining an act, by which provision was made for the protection of painters, draftsmen, and themselves. (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68).

The result of the many statutes on the subject of copyright seems to be, that all the different products of art and intellect are now adequately protected. The time would, therefore, appear to have arrived when the different enactments may advantageously be swept into one, and we recommend the subject to the professional men in the House of Commons who desire to do homage to the codifying tendency of the age, and to earn a reputation for literary and legal accomplishment, at the cost of an amount of exertion which the aid of Mr. Phillips's book would render very moderate.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—I think that the subjoined form of condition may, in some measure, meet your correspondent's requirement.

Your obedient servant,
WALTER C. METCALFE.

Epping, Dec. 23, 1863.

"That if the above bounden A. B., his heirs, executors, or administrators, do pay unto the above-named C. D., his executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of £—sterling, in the proportions and on the days following, that is to say, £—, part thereof, on the — day of — next; £—, further part thereof, on the — day of —, 18—; and £—, remainder thereof, on the — day of —, 18—; and also (in case any or more of the said sums of £—, £—, and £— shall remain unpaid after the day, or respective days, whereon the same is or are respectively hereby made payable), interest on the sum or sums so remaining unpaid, at the rate of 6l. per cent. per annum, from the said day, or respective days, until payment of the said sum or sums, without any deduction, except for property or income tax. Then the above-written bond or obligation," &c.

[Coke found in the "et ceteras" of Littleton suggestions for much valuable comment. If our correspondent had been equally attentive to the significance of the words with which his form concludes, he would not, perhaps, have been so well satisfied with it. "Etc." here stands for "shall be void and of no effect," so that one alternative of the condition is, that if the obligor, having failed to pay an instalment on the appointed day, at any time afterwards pays or tenders interest on the money in arrear, the bond shall be void; and there is, therefore, no assignable time at which the bond must be satisfied, or the penalty forfeited. But the object of the bond is to enable the obligee, if he thinks fit, to treat the penalty as absolutely forfeited, and recoverable (in judgment) immediately upon default in payment of any instalment, as well as to secure him interest at 6l. per cent. on any arrears. This is not now of any practical importance, if the obligatory part of the bond is properly framed; and the question as to the form of the condition (not perhaps insoluble) is propounded merely as a curious problem in drafting.]

At a Privy Council, held at Osborne on the 7th inst., it was decided that Parliament will meet, for the despatch of business, on Thursday, the 4th February, CONTRABAND OF WAR.

THE following observations on the important subject of "Contraband of War" are taken from the little treatise recently published by Mr. F. Hargave Hamel, intitled, "International Law in connexion with Municipal Statutes, &c., considered with reference to the case of The Alexandra."—

"Perhaps there is nothing more difficult than to lay down a settled rule to distinguish between what does and what does not constitute contraband of war, because the character of ships and merchandise in this respect changes with ever-varying circumstances, such as the object of the voyage, and the destination of the ships taken in connexion with the nature of the goods. Thus, when guns, gunpowder, swords, and bayonets are bona fide consigned from one neutral port to another, they are no more contraband of war than would be a cargo of guano; whilst a ship-load of wheat, or even of paving stones, bound for, and seeking entry into, a belligerent port might, with evidence of intention to succour the enemy, be deemed prize of war, since the one might be intended to feed the enemy, and the other to repair his fortresses.

"Neutrals are naturally anxious to diminish the list of contraband, that they may extend their commerce by conveying the goods of the hostile powers, with the less risk of confiscation. Belligerents, on the other hand, are of course interested, particularly if they possess a predominating command of the seas, in increasing the prohibitory list, to enable them the more effectually to deprive the adversary of the means of maintaining or improving his warlike position.

"When the number and variety* of the goods that have from time to time been declared contraband of war are taken into consideration, it is scarcely matter of surprise that the decisions of the authorities are so various and uncertain. Vattel enumerates arms, military and naval stores, horses, timber, and, in case of siege, provisions, as contraband of war†; and, according to the same author, even ships come within that denomination. These opinions are upheld by various treaties, ordinances, and legal decisions. Sail-cloth, tar, pitch, and hemp, being necessary to the equipment of vessels of war, and also ship timber, have been added to the list; although in some instances their hostile character has been negatived by proof of destination, as, for instance, when transmitted to an exclusively commercial port, from which it might fairly be presumed that they were to be applied to civil purposes. The raw material is viewed with more favour than articles fabricated from it‡. By a treaty between the United States and this country in 1796, it was expressly provided that unwrought iron and fir planks should be exempted from seizure.

"Under these circumstances, it would be utterly fallacious to lay down rules of universal application, as to what constitutes contraband of war. The invention of novel instruments of warfare has necessarily augmented the number of contraband articles, by embracing new materials required to render such instruments serviceable, whereby goods formerly deemed innocuous, have by force of circumstances become liable to confiscation at the hands of those against whom they are attempted to be used. Such, of course, was the case when gunpowder superseded the catapult and the bow; and again, more recently, when the power of steam was adopted for propelling vessels of war. Thus, during the Crimean campaign, engines, boilers, and other marine machinery, were amongst the prohibited articles of commerce; and now that the explosive power of gun-cotton is known, were its application to warlike purposes to become general, it would necessarily bring cotton, as well as the chemicals by which it acquires its new character, within the list of contraband of war, as the components of gunpowder, sulphur, saltpetre, &c., came to be treated.

"The most important feature in the law of contraband of war, in relation to the controversial question of the day, is, that ships and armed vessels come within that denomination.

"This opinion has prevailed and been acted upon from a very early date, and has gained strength, and indeed the full force of international law, by recognition in treaties and by the decisions of Courts, which have been accepted by European as well as American States, and by none more unequivocally than the latter. So far back as 1625, by treaty between England and the Low Countries, 'ships, arms, &c., by express mention, are deemed 'contraband of war;' and the articles enumerated, as well as 'ships and persons on board,' are declared 'good prize'. The terms of this treaty would seem to embrace every description of ship; but in 1661, by treaty between this country and Sweden†, the expression is narrowed to 'ships of war' and guardships; this very limitation points the more distinctly to the fact, that ships for warlike purposes are particularly intended. Vattel draws no distinction between contraband for naval and military warfare. Indeed, so far from considering that neutrality is violated by trading in either with the belligerent, he thus distinctly affirms the contrary, with reasons for the opinion:—'If a nation trades in arms, timber for shipbuilding, ships, and warlike stores, I cannot take it amiss that it sells such things to my enemy, provided he does not refuse to sell them to me also at a reasonable price. It carries on its trade without any design to injure me, and by continuing it in the same manner as if I were not engaged in war, it gives me no just cause of complaint.' Nay, he brings the matter home to the precise state of affairs as at present subsisting between this country and the transatlantic belligerents, for he proceeds to explain, placing himself, for argument, in the place of the belligerents:—'In what I have said above, it is supposed that my enemy goes himself to the neutral country to make his purchases.' This is exactly what the Federals are doing here with regard to arms, and what the Confederates have been charged with doing in respect of ships. But he carries the analogy still farther, by the discussion of another suppositious case—that of 'neutral nations resorting to the enemy's country for commercial purposes. It is certain, that as they have no part in my quarrel, they are under no obligation to renounce their commerce for the sake of avoiding to supply my enemy with the means of carrying on the war against me.'

"Now all this has reference, inter alia, to ships, and it is difficult to conceive how consistently with this

* The following articles have on different occasions been declared contraband of war, viz. butter, cheese, copper in sheets, cordage, corn, hemp, masts, pitch, rice, rosin, salted cod, herrings and salmon, sea biscuits, tar, and wine.

† Les choses qui sont d'un usage particulier pour la guerre et dont on empêche le transport chez l'ennemi s'appellent marchandises de contraband. the British subject can be guilty of a breach of international law, or subject himself, much less his Government, to any legitimate complaint, by carrying on with either of the belligerents, in the ordinary course of commerce, his almost peculiarly national business of a builder and vendor of ships. 'If,' says Vattel, 'they only continue their customary trade, they do not thereby declare against my interests; they only exercise a right which they are under no obligation of sacrificing to me.' He backs this argument by the remarkably clear and strong common-sense observation, that should they (the neutrals) affect to refuse selling me a single article, while at the same time they take pains to convey an abundant supply to my enemy, with an evident intention to favour him, such partial conduct would exclude them from the neutrality which they enjoyed.'

"Neutrality, then, as regards contraband of war, including ships as well as arms, according to this great authority, consists not in the refusal to supply the belligerents, but in supplying indifferently to either the merchandise they may require in accordance with the accustomed and undisturbed course of commerce. The neutral may not only sell articles contraband of war in his own country, but may send them to either of the belligerents, subject, of course, to the liability to capture by the other. The neutral market is open to the sale of ships as well as other instruments or munitions of war. The foreign belligerents may purchase from the neutral subject, both or either of these articles of contraband, they being the judges of what they require; and it appears totally at variance with the principles of neutrality, to refuse ships to the one, if we sell arms to the other, and vice versa.

"The doctrine here contended for, the practice of centuries, the dictum of Vattel just cited, the opinions of other great writers to the same effect, have been emphatically endorsed by the Americans themselves, the supreme courts of the United States having solemnly decided that there is 'nothing in their own laws' (and they have a Foreign Enlistment Act, whose provisions as to ships are analogous to our own), 'or in the law of nations, that forbids their citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale.' Nay, more, that 'it is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit' (the judicial authorities of the United States not being ignorant of our Foreign Enlistment Act), 'and which only exposes the person engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation.'

"There is an end, therefore, to all doubt, certainly as between the United States and this country, as to the fact that ships, armed ships, are contraband of war. It follows that the rights, privileges, and liabilities of neutrals in respect of ships, differ nothing from those which relate to arms and other articles of contraband.

"On the breaking out of hostilities between nations, the subjects of a neutral territory can only supply contraband of war to either of the belligerents at the risk of capture and confiscation by the other; subject to these consequences, the adventure is perfectly lawful. The deprived party has no right to complain of his loss, or to demand restitution through his own Government; nor do these perilous enterprises of the subject of a neutral power expose his Government to the charge of a breach of neutrality†. 'It was,' says Kent, 'contended on the part of the French nation, in 1796, that neutral governments were bound to restrain their subjects from selling or exporting contraband of war to the belligerent powers.' But it was successfully shewn, on the part of the United States, that neutrals may lawfully sell at home to a belligerent purchaser, or carry themselves to the belligerent powers contraband articles, subject to the right of seizure in transitu. This right has since been explicitly declared by the judicial authorities of this country. (Richardson v. Maine Ins. Comp., 6 Map. Rep. 113; The Santissima Trinidad, J. Wheaton, 282). The right of the neutral to transport, and of the hostile power to seize, are conflicting rights, and neither party can charge the other with a criminal act*.

"Formerly, by the law of nations, the carrying of contraband articles of war worked a forfeiture of the ship†. In modern practice, except when the contraband articles belong to the owner of the vessel, or where the case is attended with particular circumstances of aggravation, the penalty has been mitigated to forfeiture of freight and expenses‡. Bynkershoek strongly vindicates the strictness of the ancient law. He says, 'Publicabam quoque naves amicas si scientibus dominis contrabanda ad hostes deferrent; et nisi pacta impediunt omnino publicandæ sunt quia earum domini operantur rei illicitæ§.' And according to Heineccius—'Quemadmodum ejusmodi pacta ad exceptionem pertinent; ita facile patet regulam istis non tolli, adeoque certi juris esse ob merces illicitas naves etiam in commissum cadere||.'

COURTS-MARTIAL.

THE following observations of The Wellington Gazette and Military Chronicle, of the 15th December, 1863, on the subject of courts-martial, are deserving attention. They are contained in an article on the trial of Colonel Crawley:—

"The expense and trouble of this monster court-martial have been incurred, and we may as well see if we can extract any moral out of it. There are some people who think that the 'days of courts-martial are numbered;' but we would ask, first, how is it possible to get on without them? and, secondly, what have they done to call down such a sweeping condemnation? There are innumerable military offences which could never be treated satisfactorily by a civil tribunal, and the present court-martial furnishes an instance. The second charge is, in effect, that Colonel Crawley has endeavoured to get out of a scrape by throwing his own fault on another's shoulders; is there anything in common or statute law which renders such an evasion penal? Could a jury of grocers and publicans, reeking with sanded sugar and spurious pale ale, be competent to decide whether such conduct was 'unworthy of an officer and a gentleman?' But if this be too refined an instance, let us take some of the ordinary offences of private soldiers. Can any civil court form an accurate estimate of 'persuading to desert,' 'improper behaviour during divine service,' 'disrespect to the Queen,' 'getting drunk under rules,' 'habitual drunkenness,' 'selling arms,' 'selling a medal,' and 'creating false alarms?' Yet all these, and a hundred more, are offences incident to military life, and to exempt them from punishment would be to strike at the root of discipline, and to invoke demoralisation. Again: what can have courts-martial committed? The present trial is inconceivably long, chiefly from the immense number of witnesses; for this, however, it is not the court that is responsible, but rather those who have unduly agitated the public mind, and rendered it necessary to produce anybody who knows, or thinks he knows, anything. The cross-examination of the witnesses has in some instances (as in that of Lieutenant Fitzsimon) been vexatious and unproductive; but this is the work of the prisoner and his counsel, not of the court or the prosecutor.

"There has been, however, a serious source of delay arising from disputes between the prosecution and the prisoner as to the admissibility of evidence, and another, from the peculiar custom of carrying on all the proceedings in writing. We think that the latter custom might with advantage be abolished; and with regard to evidence, we would offer a few concluding remarks.

"The principles of the law of evidence are few and simple, and the chief difficulty is found in its ready adaptation to particular circumstances.

"It is in the ready application of the principles of evidence that courts-martial appear to be defective. This gives the prisoner's counsel a feeling of power, which sometimes rises into arrogance, and may call down a very proper rebuke. Would it not be reasonable that all officers should have an opportunity of preparing themselves for the judicial duties which may at any time be thrust upon them? The Staff College offers many advantages to the young officer; might it not be so organised as to include the study of the rules of evidence? These rules are as easy to learn as those of gunnery, of tactics, or of engineering. Those who have taken in principles when young, and have had some years to digest them, can apply them readily to any problem before them, while a man who hastily 'crams' up for an occasion is as helpless as the ancient philosopher who had only learnt to swim on dry land. Let us see this reform be introduced, and we shall soon see officers enabled to hold their own in their peculiar courts. To give the power of speech to counsel, and to abolish for ever the system of written questions and answers, would do much to shorten the proceedings; but the main point is to give moral dignity to the court, whereby it may curb the luxuriance of speech, and keep prosecutor, prisoner, and counsel within the limits defined by the issues which are brought before it."

Together with the Acts of Parliament, Forms, and Precedents relating to the subject. Being especially intended for popular use in Seaport Towns. By W. T. GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. Greenhow, brings into a popular shape, and to the latest date, the entire body of legal regulations affecting the shipping trade of the country alike in relation to owners, merchants, masters, and seamen, and is especially adapted for ordinary use by all persons connected with the business of seaport towns."—Times, Jan. 31, 1863.

"The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. But Mr. Greenhow has achieved it, and placed within reach of every one connected with shipping a valuable compendium of the law relating to that branch of industry."—Shipping and Mercantile Gazette.

"It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom, therefore, the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 16, 1864.

PARLIAMENT has been summoned to meet for the despatch of business on Thursday, the 4th February. The approaching session, like the last, will open under favourable circumstances for the passing of measures of law reform, and we hope that, like the last, it will be productive of many. The state of Europe is, indeed, such that war may break out at any moment; but even supposing such a misfortune to occur, that is no reason for arresting the march of legal improvement at home; and although the numerous projects for constructing railways and other public undertakings, especially in the metropolis, are likely, if persisted in, to give ample employment to parliamentary committees, still in the political atmosphere there is scarcely a breath stirring—a state of things the continuance of which is likely enough, however rash it would be to guarantee it.

A good instalment of legal reform was paid last session by the act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 125, founded on a bill introduced by the Lord Chancellor, intitled "An Act for promoting the Revision of the Statute Law, by repealing certain Enactments which have ceased to be in force or have become unnecessary." It remains to be seen whether any further steps towards the consolidation or codification of the law will be proposed by his Lordship, according to the principles laid down in the celebrated speech delivered by him in the House of Lords on the 12th June, 1863; and should this be so, whether those proposals will be discussed by the Legislature, or, like the former, be virtually taken on trust from the persons by whom the bills are drawn up.

The laws relating to the punishment of criminals, and the system of prison discipline are in a state anything but satisfactory. The commission issued by the Crown in December, 1862, "to inquire into the operation of the acts relating to transportation and penal servitude, and into the manner in which sentences of transportation and penal servitude have been, and are, carried into effect under the provision of the said acts, or any of them," have made their report, to which we drew the attention of our readers immediately on its publication. (See 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 267). That report is unsatisfactory on many grounds—especially because two of its members dissented from the conclusions of their colleagues, and one of those two, the Lord Chief Justice, made a separate and very able report of his own, in strong antagonism to their views. Moreover, one principal feature of the report of the Commissioners is the recommendation that Western Australia be used as a place of transportation for criminals—a proposal which has excited an amount of opposition throughout the Australian continent sufficient to shew that any attempt to carry it out would be an extremely questionable, if not a dangerous, measure. We have already sacrificed enough to the absurd system of coaxing and petting criminals, introduced by the humanitarians of our day, without incurring, in further prosecution of their views, the risk of losing our colonies at the antipodes.

The marriage laws of the United Kingdom require large amendment; but it may be a question whether the time for this has yet arrived. One great source of difficulty is to be found in the peculiar marriage laws of Scotland and Ireland, of which the Yelverton case, lately before the tribunals of both countries, and which will, we believe, come before the House of Lords in the approaching session, affords a striking instance. There, an action was brought in Ireland against Major Yelverton for goods supplied to his wife, to which the defence was, that the person to whom they were supplied was not his lawful wife. In support of the plaintiff's case, it was attempted to prove a marriage in Scotland by mere acknowledgment of the parties, without any ceremony, civil or religious—a proceeding allowable by the law of that country, and also a marriage in Ireland by a Roman Catholic clergyman; to the latter of which the plaintiff set up for answer that it was void by statute, on the ground that although the female was a Roman Catholic the defendant was a Protestant. On this latter question the evidence was conflicting, but the jury found for the plaintiff. A suit in Scotland having been instituted, involving the same questions, it was contended that the evidence was not sufficient to establish an irregular marriage, even by the Scotch law: a point on which the judge by whom the cause was tried ruled one way, and the Court above another. As subsequent to both these marriages, or supposed marriages, the defendant had married another person, and had issue by her, the validity of that marriage, and the legitimacy of that issue, depend on the question of the validity of the former marriages.

There are other anomalies in our marriage law, and our law of divorce is not quite satisfactory. The great experiment of the establishment of a Court, empowered to grant divorces à vinculo matrimonii, by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, has been a success upon the whole, especially as it has removed from our jurisprudence the reproach, that on the subject of divorce, there was not among us "lex omnibus una." But the Legislature which passed that statute disregarded too much the principle that the parties to the matrimonial contract are not the sole parties interested in its observance, and consequently have no right to put an end to it according to their mutual interest, pleasure, or caprice, but that third parties may be, and society always is, concerned in the matter. In this the Legislature have been under the necessity of retracing their steps, and the stat. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, accordingly enables the Crown, or other persons, to intervene in divorce suits, where there is reason to suspect collusion or connivance between the parties. On one occasion the present Lord Chancellor, when Attorney-General, announced his intention of proceeding by indictment against parties to collusive suits in the Divorce Court whenever he could obtain sufficient evidence of the fact; and it appears to us, that if such conduct cannot be reached by the common law, it should be rendered criminal by statute. And, indeed, it may be a question whether adultery ought not to involve some consequences more serious to the guilty party than the dissolution of a marriage of which he is, perhaps, only too anxious to get rid. If respondents and co-respondents, against whom judgment is given by the Divorce Court in cases of alleged adultery, were liable to penal consequences, collusive divorces would be less frequent. Again, the position of co-respondents in that court seems a hard one. By the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 28, any man may institute a suit against his wife, imputing adultery, and charge as partner in her crime, any person, however high in station, or irreproachable in character. So, in a petition by a wife against her husband for adultery, she may, with the permission of the Court, join as co-respondent the person with whom he is alleged to have committed adultery, who may be a female of purity ever so unspotted. And in either of the above cases, after the cause has been brought before the world, the petitioner may withdraw or compromise it with the accused spouse, while the unfortunate co-respondent, to whose reputation damage perhaps inestimable has been done, would have no other remedy than remuneration for his costs.

It is of course impossible to predict, far less enumerate, the proposals of legal reform which will come before Parliament. Let us hope that many sound ones will be brought forward, and that none but sound ones will receive the sanction of the Legislature.

18. That no call to the Bar shall take place except during term; and that such call shall be made on the same day by the several societies, namely, on the sixteenth day of each term, unless such day shall happen to be Sunday, and in such case on the Monday after.

Certificate to practise under the Bar.

19. That no student of any of the said societies shall be allowed to apply for or take out any certificate to practise, either directly or indirectly, as a special pleader, or conveyancer, or draftsman in equity, without the special permission of the masters of the bench of the society of which he is a student, to be given by order of such masters, and that no such permission shall be granted until the student applying shall have kept twelve terms.

22. That the regulations herein contained as to screening names in the halls, benchers' rooms, and treasury or stewards' offices, shall apply to students seeking certificates to practise as special pleaders, conveyancers, or equity draftsmen.

Council of Legal Education.

23. That a standing council shall be established, to be called "The Council of Legal Education," and to consist of eight benchers, two to be nominated by each of the Inns of Court, and of whom four shall be a quorum. That the members of such council shall remain in office for two years, and that each Inn shall have power to fill up any vacancy that may occur in the number of its nominees during that period. That to this council shall be intrusted the power and duty of superintending the whole subject of the education of the students, and of arranging and settling the details of the several measures which may be deemed necessary to be adopted, and such other matters as herein in that behalf mentioned.

24. That the council of legal education shall have power to grant dispensations to students, who shall have been prevented by any reasonable cause from complying with all the regulations as to the attendance on lectures and classes which shall from time to time be established.

25. That all arrangements touching the number of public lectures to be delivered by the readers, and the hours and extent of private classes, shall be left to the council.

Education Terms.

26. That, for the purposes of education, the legal year shall be considered as divided into three terms, one commencing on the 1st November, and ending on the 22nd December; the second commencing on the 11th January, and ending on the 30th March; and the third commencing on the 15th April, and ending on the 31st July; subject to a deduction of the days intervening between the end of Easter and the beginning of Trinity Term.

Readers.

27. That, for the purpose of affording to the students the means of obtaining instruction and guidance in their legal studies, five readers shall be appointed, viz.:—

1. A reader on jurisprudence and civil and international law, to be named by the society of the Middle Temple.
2. A reader on the law of real property, to be named by the society of Gray's Inn.
3. A reader on the common law, to be named by the society of the Inner Temple.
4. A reader on equity, to be named by the society of Lincoln's Inn; and
5. A reader on constitutional law and legal history, to be named by the council of legal education.

28. That the readers shall be appointed for a period of three years.

29. That the duties of the readers (subject to regulation by the council of legal education) shall consist of the delivery of two courses of lectures in each educational term; of the formation of classes of students, for the purpose of giving instruction in a more detailed and personal form than can be supplied by general lectures; and of affording to students generally, advice and directions for the conduct of their professional studies.

30. That a separate course of lectures on international law shall be delivered, and shall for the present be delivered by the reader on jurisprudence and civil and international law.

31. That it shall be part of the duty of the reader on the common law to give instruction in his lectures on the subject of the office and duties of magistrates.

32. That the readers on common law and on equity shall have particular regard to the law of evidence in their lectures and other instruction to the students.

33. That (subject to regulation by the council of legal education) one of the courses of lectures to be delivered by the reader on common law, the reader on equity, and the reader on real property, shall be on the elementary, and the other on the more advanced, portion to which his lectures apply.

Emoluments of Readers.

34. That each reader shall receive the fixed sum of four hundred guineas a year.

35. That the fees to be paid by students for the privilege of attending private classes shall be distributed among the readers at the end of each year, in proportion to the number of students attending their respective private classes.

Fees payable by Students.

36. That each student shall, on admission, pay a sum of five guineas, which shall entitle him to attend the lectures of all the readers.

37. That each student shall be privileged to attend all the private classes on payment of five guineas per annum.

Examinations on Subjects of Lectures.

38. That in the month of July, in each year, there shall be voluntary examinations of the students upon the subjects of the several courses of lectures, but no student shall be entitled to go in for examination on any of the subjects, unless he shall have obtained a certificate from the reader that he has duly attended his lectures and classes upon the subject on which he offers himself for examination. Each examination shall be conducted by some barristers or barrister (not being the reader of the class to be examined) to be nominated for that purpose by the council of legal education, and the council of legal education shall have power to allot such remuneration as they shall think fit to such examiners.

39. That no student who shall be entitled to a certificate of having attended the advanced course of lectures of the reader on common law, on equity, or on the law of real property, shall be at liberty to go in for examination upon the subject of the elementary course of lectures on the same head; and that no student shall be admitted for examination on the subject of the elementary course of lectures, on any of the last-mentioned heads, after he shall have kept more than eight terms, or for examination on any of the subjects, after he shall have kept all his terms, unless in either case the council of legal education shall for special reasons think fit to allow the same.

40. That, as an inducement to students to attend and make themselves proficient in the subjects of the lectures, exhibitions of the respective values herein-after mentioned, shall be founded, and be conferred on the most distinguished students at the examinations in July.

41. That five of such exhibitions shall be given to members of the advanced classes in the common law, in the law of real property, and in equity, and the most proficient among the students in jurisprudence, the civil law, and international law, and in constitutional law and legal history, every year, and be thirty guineas a year, to endure for two years, making ten running at one time.

42. That three of such exhibitions shall be given to members of the elementary classes in the common law, in the law of real property, and in equity, and be twenty guineas a year, to endure for two years, making six running at the same time; but to merge on the acquisition of a superior studentship.

43. That all the students attending the lectures of any of the readers shall be at liberty to attend the several oral examinations; and that all members of the Inns of Court who shall have obtained written orders of admission from any of the readers, or from any bencher of any of the societies, shall also be at liberty to attend such examinations.

General Examinations.

44. That general examinations shall be held twice a year, for the examination of all such students as shall be desirous of being examined previously to being called to the Bar; and such examinations shall be conducted by at least two members of the council, jointly with the five readers; and certificates of having satisfactorily passed such examination shall be given to such students as shall appear to the examiners to be entitled thereto.

45. That such examinations shall be held in or shortly before Michaelmas Term, and in or shortly before Trinity Term.

46. That as an inducement to students to propose themselves for such examination, studentships and exhibitions shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each, and twenty-five guineas per annum each, respectively, to continue for a period of three years; and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each general examination, and one such exhibition shall be conferred on the student who obtains the second position; and further, the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations; and the Inns of Court to which such students as aforesaid belong may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students previously to their being called to the Bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship, exhibition, or certificate, unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students has been such as entitles them thereto.

47. That at every call to the Bar, those students who have passed a general examination, and either obtained a studentship, an exhibition at such examination, or a certificate of honour, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day.

Common Fund.

48. That the four Inns of Court shall form a common fund by annual contributions, the amounts of which shall be mutually agreed on; and out of which fund shall be drawn the stipends to be assigned to the readers, the remuneration to examiners, and such studentships and exhibitions as shall from time to time be conferred upon students, and such necessary expenses as shall be incurred by the council of legal education.

49. That the fees of five guineas paid by students on admission shall form part of the common fund.

Commencement.

50. That these regulations shall take effect as from the first day of Hilary Term, 1864.

The above regulations were sanctioned and confirmed by orders of the several societies, as under-mentioned:—

MIDDLE TEMPLE, 18th December, 1863.

GRAY'S-INN, 18th December, 1863.

LINCOLN'S-INN, 22nd December, 1863.

INNER TEMPLE, 22nd December, 1863.

Mr. Serjeant Ballantine has received a patent of precedence.

We have to record the decease of B. Combe, Esq., police magistrate for Southwark. Mr. Combe was in the seventy-fifth year of his age, and was called to the Bar by the Hon. On the first day of Hilary Term, while the four judges of the Queen's Bench were sitting, Mr. Justice Shee, the newly appointed judge, came into court and took the usual oath of allegiance, under the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48, and also the oath required to be taken by Roman Catholics under the 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, commonly called "The Catholic Emancipation Act."

The union of the "National Association for the Promotion of Social Science with the Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law," has been effected. The meetings of the joint body will be held for the future at the rooms hitherto occupied by the latter Society, at No. 3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall. At the last meeting of the Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law, previous to its junction with the other Society, W. T. S. Daniel, Esq., in the chair, the minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. A paper was read by Mr. Edward Webster, on "The System of Preparing, Editing, and Publishing Cases argued and determined by the Superior Courts, in connexion with a Minister and Department of Public Justice to be established by the Legislature." Mr. Edgar moved that the paper be printed and circulated among the members. Mr. Pulling seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 23, 1864.

WE read in the papers, that Lord Henry Lennox has sent a notice for insertion in the books of the House of Commons, that he will, on an early day after the meeting of Parliament, "call the attention of the House to the present mode of administering the laws which affect capital punishment, and to the circumstances under which the Crown has on various occasions been advised to exercise the royal prerogative of mercy." We hope that this statement is correct, and if it is, that his Lordship will proceed with his motion, in which it is impossible not to wish him success. The time has come when the numerous extraordinary exercises of this noble prerogative, a prerogative which of all others requires to be exercised with the greatest possible judgment and merciful discrimination, that have perplexed the public mind for so many years, should be thoroughly inquired into, and the principle—if, indeed, there is any principle—by which our rulers are guided in the matter, be distinctly explained. The cases of Celestina Sommers and Dr. Smethurst, in England, Jessie McLachlan, in Scotland, Mr. Kirwan, in Ireland, &c., are in the recollection of everybody. But a case of recent occurrence has even more pointedly aroused attention.

We allude to the case of George Victor Townley, which we have deferred noticing until all the facts were fairly before the public; for it has been the misfortune of this case, as of many others, to be discussed piecemeal, on partial and inaccurate representations. We are now in a condition to narrate it in a connected form.

George Victor Townley was convicted for murder at the recent Winter Assizes of Derby, and left for execution. The defence rested on the insanity of the accused, and no objection is made, either to the correctness of the law on that subject, as laid down by the judge, or to the verdict of guilty returned by the jury. But Martin, B., before whom the case was tried, addressed a letter to Sir George Grey, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in which he says—

"The conviction was, in my opinion, right; but Mr. Forbes Winslow and Dr. Gisborne were examined at the trial, and both deposed in the strongest manner that the prisoner is now of diseased mind, and absolutely insane. I think it right to call your attention at once to the subject, with a view to a correct opinion being formed as to the propriety of his execution."

The Dr. Gisborne here referred to was the surgeon to the Derby County Gaol from the 24th August, 1863, the day on which Townley entered the prison, to the present time. In answer to an inquiry from the Home Secretary as to his own opinion relative to the sanity or insanity of the condemned man, the learned baron replied—

"I cannot say that I have formed any decided opinion upon the point. The demeanour of the prisoner afforded me no means of arriving at one. He sat during the trial with his head depressed; I scarcely once saw his countenance; and he never spoke. I would not be justified in saying, that the evidence of Mr. Forbes Winslow and Dr. Gisborne is not correct; but I certainly think, and have thought ever since the trial, that there ought to be further inquiry."

In consequence of these suggestions, the Secretary of State, on the 23rd December, addressed, through his under secretary, a communication to the Commissioners in Lunacy, in which he says—

"Sir George Grey is of opinion that the verdict of the jury, in which Mr. Baron Martin, who presided at the trial, concurs, and which appears to Sir George Grey, from the evidence, to have been right, decides the question as to the sanity of the prisoner at the time when the crime was committed. The only question, therefore, on which any doubt exists, and upon which, in the opinion of the judge, there ought to be further inquiry, is, whether the prisoner is now insane."

"It is to be regretted that this question was not raised before the trial, when it could have been submitted to a jury; but, under the actual circumstances, Sir George Grey requests that the Commissioners in Lunacy will be so good as to undertake the inquiry recommended by Mr. Baron Martin, and report to me their opinion, for his information, whether or not the prisoner is at the present time of unsound mind."

The Commissioners in Lunacy undertook the inquiry, and on the 28th December reported as follows:—

"The result of the examination of the officials of the prison, of which the detail will be found appended to our report, may be stated briefly as in effect establishing, without dispute, that there has been substantially no change in the prisoner's mental state since the trial; that such difference or alteration as may have been noted has been an improvement; and that he has been altogether more at ease, more resigned, and at times even cheerful, since the sentence was passed upon him. Not at any time since he was first brought to the gaol, according to the testimony of all who have had the means of watching him closely, does he appear to have been more rational than he is at present."

"In the endeavour to form a satisfactory opinion as to his existing mental state, we have found it impossible to exclude the consideration of what his mental condition had been during the entire period of his imprisonment. What it is now it has been throughout; and the detail of what was elicited from him at our interviews, appended to this report, is probably sufficiently ample to enable the Secretary of State to form an opinion for himself as to the prisoner's moral condition, the views entertained by him of the murder he committed, the motives that impelled him to it, and the reasons by which he justifies it. We have to remark, that, generally his manner during these interviews, with one or two exceptions which we have noted, was remarkably calm, quiet, and self-possessed; and though he seems to have had no difficulty in at once, from the questions put to him, correctly inferring the object and drift of our examination, we saw not the least grounds for suspecting him of any intention to mislead us by putting on a manner not natural to him, or feigning what he did not feel.

"In view of the extravagant opinions thus deliberately professed by him, of his extraordinarily perverted moral sense, and of the hereditary taint alleged, and apparently proved, to have existed in the family of the prisoner's grandmother, we cannot consider him to be of sound mind; but his views of right and wrong, false as they are, appear to have been coherently acted upon, and with a full sense of what they involved. He reasons now, as he acted in committing the murder. Upon the point of his alleged belief in a conspiracy against him we pressed him very closely; but we could not satisfy ourselves that this was in the nature of a delusion. It seems certain that some members of the deceased's family objected to his engagement with her, while others favoured it, or were indifferent; and that the former had obtained an influence over her some little time before her letter was written, which was meant finally to put an end to it. Hence he believed that she had been acted upon by a conspiracy, which was meant 'in the tenderest point' to injure him; and all the questions which we put upon this part of the case failed to draw from him anything that could bear other construction than that he had taken a disordered and morbid view of an actual occurrence.

"Being of opinion, therefore, that the prisoner continues to be now in the same mental state as when he committed the murder and underwent his trial, we think, that, applying the law as laid down by Mr. Baron Martin to this case, the prisoner George Victor Townley was justly convicted.

"W. G. CAMPBELL.

"JAMES WILKES.

"JOHN FORSTER."

Although this report of the Commissioners is somewhat long and somewhat deficient in distinctness, and upon the whole gives an uncertain sound, it amounts, in substance, to saying that the conviction of Townley ought not to be disturbed, in which opinion, as already seen, both the Home Secretary and Baron Martin concur.

In the meantime, however, other machinery was at work to rescue the condemned man from the hated grasp of the law. On the 27th December, 1863, a certificate was drawn up, and afterwards presented to Sir G. Grey, signed by three justices of the peace (one for the county, and two for the borough of Derby) and two medical men, stating, in the terms required by law, that they had examined and inquired into the mental state of the prisoner, and certifying that he was insane. This was followed by a certificate to the same effect, dated the 29th December, and signed by two justices of the peace for the county of Derby (one of them being the same who had signed the former certificate), and the same two medical men.

On receipt of their certificate, Sir G. Grey, considering that the stat. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, s. 1, left him no discretionary power in the matter, ordered Townley to be transferred to a lunatic asylum until he shall recover his reason.

This raises a question, the importance of which it is difficult to overrate, namely, is the language of that statute merely permissive, or is it compulsory on the Secretary of State?

The words of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, s. 1, are as follows:—"If any person, while imprisoned in any prison or other place of confinement under any sentence of death, transportation, or imprisonment, or under a charge of any offence, or for not finding bail for good behaviour or to keep the peace or to answer a criminal charge, or in consequence of any summary conviction or order by any justice or justices of the peace, or under any other than civil process, shall appear to be insane, it shall be lawful for any two justices of the peace of the county, city, borough, or place where such person is imprisoned to inquire, with the aid of two physicians or surgeons, as to the insanity of such person; and if it shall be duly certified by such justices and such physicians or surgeons that such person is insane, it shall be lawful for one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, upon receipt of such certificate, to direct, by warrant under his hand, that such person shall be removed to such county lunatic asylum, or other proper receptacle for insane persons as the said Secretary of State may judge proper and appoint; and every person so removed under this act, or already removed or in custody under any former act relating to insane prisoners, shall remain under confinement in such county asylum or other proper receptacle as aforesaid, or in any other county lunatic asylum or other proper receptacle to which such person may be removed, or may have been already removed, or in which he may be in custody by virtue of any like order, until it shall be duly certified to one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, by two physicians or surgeons, that such person has become of sound mind, whereupon the said Secretary of State is hereby authorised, if such person shall still remain subject to be continued in custody, to issue his warrant to the keeper or other person having the care of any such asylum or receptacle as aforesaid, directing that such person shall be removed back from thence to the prison or other place of confinement from whence he or she shall have been taken, or, if the period of imprisonment or custody of such person shall have expired, that he or she shall be discharged."

This section only says, "it shall be lawful" for the Home Secretary, on receipt of such certificate, to direct the removal of a prisoner to a lunatic asylum; it neither contains negative words, nor uses the expression, "he is hereby required to do so," or language to that effect.

The following are the rules observed in the construction of statutes in this respect:—2 Dwarria on Statutes, 712—"Words of permission shall in certain cases be obligatory. Where a statute directs the doing of a thing for the sake of justice, the word may means the same as shall. The stat. 23 Hen. 6, c. 10, says, the sheriff &c., may take bail; but the construction has been, that he shall be bound to bail." [This dictum is to be found in many of the books, but its foundation fails, for the words of the statute are "les ditz vis- counts, &c., lessevent hors du prison tous maners des personnes, &c., sur reasonable suerta, &c." . . .] "So, if a statute says, that a thing may be done which is for the public benefit, it shall be construed that it must be done." P. 713. "Statutes are also sometimes only directing what is to be done, at other times compulsory; that is, according to their provisions, discretionary or imperative." P. 715. "Negative words will make a statute imperative; and it is apprehended affirmative may, if they are absolute, explicit, and peremptory, and shew that no discretion is intended to be given."

Broom's Maxims, 173, 3rd ed.:—"Argumentum ab inconvenienti plurimum valet in lege." (Co. Litt. 66. a.) "In doubtful cases, arguments drawn ab inconvenienti are of great weight. Thus, arguments of inconvenience are sometimes of great value upon the question of intention. If there be in any deed or instrument equivocal expressions, and great inconvenience must necessarily follow from one construction, it is strong to shew that such construction is not according to the true intention of the grantor; but where there is no equivocal expression in the instrument, and the words used admit only of one meaning, arguments of inconvenience only prove want of foresight in the grantor. . . ." P. 175. "In construing an act of Parliament, the same rule applies. If the words used by the Legislature, in framing any particular clause, have a necessary meaning, it will be the duty of the Court to construe the clause accordingly, whatever may be the inconvenience of such a course. Where a statute is imperative, no reasoning ab inconvenienti should prevail. But, unless it is very clear that violence would be done to the language of the act by adopting any other construction, any great inconvenience which might result from that suggested, may certainly afford fair ground for supposing that it could not be what was contemplated by the Legislature, and will warrant the Court in looking for some other interpretation."

Now, what are the words in the section before us to shew that the directory language in it should be understood in a peremptory sense; or what is the evil to be avoided by putting that interpretation upon it. Far from this, we see great inconvenience the other way; for the construction of the legal advisers of the Home Secretary must go this length—that so long as the certificate is in form, he is bound by its statements, even though he should himself believe them false. More than this. The certificate must be signed by two justices of the peace and two medical men. Suppose fifty justices of the peace and fifty medical men were to state their conviction to the contrary, still the Secretary of State must act on the certificate. Or, suppose the certificate of insanity, although in legal form, is founded on an illegal reason (a thing in the actual case by no means improbable), e. g. that the parties signing it disliked capital punishment, or that they believed that, although perfectly conscious of the difference between right and wrong, the prisoner laboured under irresistible impulse to crime, the Secretary of State is still bound to act on the certificate. That the Legislature did not intend this is palpable, and the only question is, whether, by the unskilful use of language, they have placed on the statute-book an enactment open to so monstrous an interpretation. In any event, a declaratory statute ought to be passed on this subject without a moment's delay.

We have hitherto proceeded on the assumption of bona fides, discretion, impartiality, and absence of prejudice on the part of the justices of the peace and the medical witnesses who depose to the insanity of the prisoner. Let us see how this stands in the case before us. The inquiry into Townley's sanity was started by Martin, B., in consequence of evidence to that effect given by Dr. Winslow and Dr. Gainsford. The latter has published a singular letter, in which he avows, that on Townley's first entrance into the prison, he was impressed with the belief that "he was sound in mind and body."

"From all that I saw and heard I was sorely perplexed as to the true state of his mind. Sometimes I thought he was insane. Again I thought he was sane. In this difficulty I remained till the assizes approached. Mr. Leech called on me a fortnight before the trial. I told him that I was desirous of having nothing to do with either the prosecution or defence; that I could only state to the jury what I had observed; and that I considered Townley suffered from a morbid condition of mind. Some days afterwards I had a consultation with Dr. Hitchman, and our joint opinion was, that no case of legal insanity could be established, and that an intelligent jury would be certain to find him guilty. About this time Dr. Forbes Winslow, a great authority in lunacy, saw Townley, and reported on his case. This I read carefully. Dr. Winslow had no doubt that Townley's delusions and statements emanated from organic brain mischief—that he was insane. I put all these varied and accumulated facts, opinions, &c., together, and after balancing the evidence before me, and endeavouring to give a mature and impartial judgment, I came to the conclusion, through the portals of doubt, that Townley was of unsound mind. . . . Almost till going into the witness-box I was undecided as to the opinion I should give. I told Mr. Leech I should be guided much by what transpired in court." The other witness is Dr. Winslow, whose opinions on the subject of insanity are well known. The following are some of them, which are taken from a paper read by him before the Juridical Society. (See its transactions, vol. 1, p. 617):—

"Before I proceed to the consideration of homicidal monomania, and to those morbid states of alleged criminal irresponsibility connected with what are termed blind and irresistible impulses, I would premise that I have always taken exception to these phrases; I think they are unfortunate and unhappy nosological designations of admitted and accepted states of mental disorder associated with a desire to destroy life.

"The terms 'homicidal monomania,' 'blind and irresistible impulse,' are, I admit, open to grave objections, and to serious abuse. Of the existence of a type of insanity without delirium or apparent delusion, suddenly manifesting itself, and impelling its miserable victims to destroy those nearest and dearest to them, there cannot be a question. There are other cases (and such will be found in most lunatic asylums) in which the mind of the patient appears to be absorbed with one horrible homicidal idea, that being the predominant and characteristic symptom of the mental alienation. A case is recorded in a French journal of a man whose state of mind was made the subject of judicial investigation in France, who for twenty-six years was haunted by an intense desire to destroy human life. He freely confessed that his mind had for this long period been absorbed in this one idea."

"In many conditions of disordered brain and mind, the patient suffers acutely from these 'resisted' impulses and morbid mental suggestions. This is one of the most distressing types of nervous and mind disorder coming within the range of the physician's observation and treatment. In many cases, the unhappy patient is fully and painfully conscious of his morbid condition of thought; and it occasionally happens that so acute is the agony of mind consequent upon the struggle to conquer these suggestions, that relief is sought for in suicide. In this stage of consciousness the patient is occasionally able to appreciate that his sensations are perverted, his thoughts morbid, perceptions false, and his impulses wrongly directed.

"Dr. Rush refers to the case of a lady, who prayed fervently that she might be relieved from the horror of her own morbid thoughts by a complete loss of reason!" (P. 625).

"All crime is alleged to spring from an unresisted and uncontrolled impulse; and a distinguished judge once declared from the bench, when reference was made to the subject of morbid irresistible impulses, that it was one of the objects of punishment to teach men, viciously and criminally disposed, the duty and necessity of restraining their wicked inclinations and impulses. No one doubts the correctness of this principle. But surely it is unphilosophic not to draw a right distinction between a normal and healthy disposition to crime, and those occasionally resisted, and often unhappily irresistible, tendencies to what the law considers wicked, vicious, criminal, and punishable acts, clearly connected with, and originating in, a pathological condition of the material instrument of thought disordering the mental operations. Was not this distinction entirely lost sight of when Lord Hale committed himself to the dogma, that 'all crime was partial insanity?' and did not a non-recognition of this great principle lead Dr. Haslam to declare, that no mind was sound except that of the Deity? There are insane impulses, and healthy impulses, to crime and vice; and I think no person acquainted with the phenomena of diseased mind would confound one condition with the other.

"A person may, with the object of obtaining some great pecuniary compensation, set fire to his house. Another man, with no possible chance or hope of advantage or gain, does the same thing under the influence of an insane impulse. A mother murders her child to destroy all evidence of her moral delinquency; another woman sacrifices the life of her offspring to which she is tenderly attached, under the terrible dominion of morbid desire to destroy. A person in a drunken brawl quarrels with his wife because she refuses to supply him with intoxicating drink, and ends by destroying her life. Another man, he may be a devoted, affectionate, and loving husband, without exhibiting any previous evidence of insanity, being seized with an attack of homicidal frenzy, rushes upon his wife and cuts her throat! A man may enter a shop and purloin some article of value. Another person, moving in good society, and of high and unimpeachable integrity, and above want, may, in a state of mental disorder, commit a similar offence, conscious at the time of the certainty of detection, disgrace, ruin, and punishment. One man practises his profession as a thief—it is his vocation; the other person commits a motiveless crime under the influence of a morbid, insane, and irresistible impulse. I readily admit that such cases require to be most jealously scrutinised. I do not, however, think there can be much practical difficulty in diagnosing and discriminating judiciously between the two classes of cases.

"To divert, however, to the subject of resisted insane impulses.

"Patients often complain of being subject to this type of mental disorder, and feel the necessity for restraint and medical treatment. The suggestion to self-destruction and commission of homicide, without any other evidence of insanity in the popular acceptance of the term, is a common symptom of disorder of the brain and nervous system. The patient, in describing his mental state to his physician, says that the suggestion is, 'cut your throat,'—'poison—drown yourself,'—'cut your wife's throat,'—'murder your child,'—'poison him.' Persons in this state of mind (notwithstanding the presence of great disturbance of the functions of the brain and disorder of the general health) are able to resist, for a period, these insane suggestions and impulses; but if they should yield to them, and the suggestion be an irresistible instead of a resisted one, what would Mr. Stephen's opinion be of their legal responsibility in relation to any offence they might commit?" (Pp. 626-628).

"I may be asked, what principle I would propound for the guidance of courts of law in these cases. I cannot but repeat what I have already declared to be my conviction, that in every criminal case where the question of responsibility arises in the course of judicial inquiry, if it be possible to establish any degree of positive insanity, it should always be viewed as a valid plea for a considerable mitigation of punishment, and as prima facie evidence in favour of the prisoner; and in no case where insanity clearly exists (without regard to its nature and amount) ought the extreme penalty of the law to be inflicted.

"What, I may be asked, is my test of insanity? I have none. I know of no unerring, infallible, and safe rule or standard applicable to all cases. The only logical and philosophic mode of procedure in doubtful cases of mental alienation, is to compare the mind of the lunatic at the period of his suspected insanity with its prior natural and healthy condition: in other words, to consider the intellect in relation to itself and to no artificial a priori test. Each individual case must be viewed in its own relations. It is clear that such is the opinion of the judges, notwithstanding they maintained as a test of responsibility a knowledge of right and wrong. Can any other conclusion be drawn from the language used by the judges when propounding in the House of Lords their view of insanity in connexion with crime? 'The facts,' they say, 'of each particular case must of necessity present themselves with endless variety and with every share of difference in each case; and as it is their duty to declare the law upon each particular case, upon facts proved before them, and after hearing arguments of counsel thereon, they deem it at once impracticable, and at the same time dangerous to the administration of justice, if it were practicable, to attempt to make minute applications of the principles involved in the answers given by them to the questions proposed.' This is a safe, judicious, and philosophic mode of investigating these painful cases; and if strictly adhered to, the ends of justice would be secured, and the requirements of science satisfied." (Pp. 632, 633).

If the criminal classes of the community do not avail themselves of the hint afforded by this case as to the means of escaping the consequences of their misdeeds, they do not possess the intelligence for which credit is commonly given them.

It has often occurred to us, that the principle by which the damages in an action for slander are governed is a very unsatisfactory one, and requires the consideration of a court of error. In the case of Parkins v. Scott (31 L. J., Ex., 331; 8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 593), it was laid down, that where the words are only actionable by reason of special damage, a defendant is not liable for any damage caused by the unauthorised repetition of them to third persons. This decision was based upon the previous case of Ward v. Weeks (7 Bing. 211), by which the Court felt themselves bound.

Now, it is clear, that, upon this principle, a man may often be unprotected against the actual damage which the slander creates; and it seems to us, that the rule is inconsistent with the nature of the action, which is based upon the tendency of men, including, of course, the ladies, to repeat to others what they have heard themselves. The "fama malum quo non aliud velocius ullum," is circulated, as it can only be, by the tongue or the pen, and the worse the report the more likely, we all know, it is to be so circulated. Moreover, this rule of limiting the damages seems to be inconsistent with the law, by which actions may be maintained for words which are actionable in themselves, without any proof of special damages; and why? Not because it is assumed that the damage would be caused by the words being originally spoken in the presence of one or more person or persons, but because it is assumed that the words will be repeated by those persons. Thus, to cite one of many cases; in the case of Evans v. Harris (26 L. J., Ex., 31), Williams, J., allowed evidence to be given of a general loss of custom by the plaintiff—a baker—although he would not allow him to prove the loss of any particular customers, as there was no special damage laid in the declaration; and the Court upheld this ruling. Now, this general loss of custom must have been caused by the repetition of the slander by the original hearers. If they had not repeated it the customers could not have heard it, for there is no authority for assuming against the defendant that he had uttered the words to other persons. He is liable for what is proved, and no more.

The case of Parkins v. Scott and the previous decisions upon which it is founded, appear also to be in conflict with other cases. For instance, one head of special damage is the loss of hospitality. Now this damage has not, so far as we are aware, been limited to a loss sustained at the hands of the person who heard the slander uttered: it has been extended to the case of others who heard it repeated, and excluded the plaintiff from their houses. The precedents are framed upon this assumption.

We must, therefore, venture to think that these cases of Ward v. Weeks and Parkins v. Scott require some further consideration. There is an old Persian proverb, which Anglicised, is, "Of thy unspoken word thou art master, but thy spoken word is master of thee:" that is,—A man can never tell the consequences which will ensue to others, and for which he must be liable, of words maliciously and rashly uttered. If a man is only to be liable for the damage which the persons who first hear them can cause to the person of whom they are spoken, in many cases probably that damage will be nominal, while the slandered person, however seriously damaged, will be unable to trace them from speaker to speaker, and will practically be without redress.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—I submit to you the following form of condition, as an answer to the challenge given in your number of the 19th December last:—

"THE CONDITION of the above-written obligation is such, that if the said A. B., his heirs, executors, or administrators, shall pay to the said C. D., his executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of 3000*l.*, by three equal instalments, in manner following—that is to say, the sum of 1000*l.* on the 1st day of June next, the sum of 1000*l.* on the 1st day of December next, and the sum of 1000*l.* on the 1st day of June, 1865; or in case any of such instalments shall not be punctually paid on the day hereinbefore appointed for the payment thereof, shall, before any action or suit on the above-written obligation shall have been commenced, pay to the said C. D., his executors, &c., the amount of the instalment so in arrear, together with interest at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum thereon from the day on which such instalment ought to have been paid, up to and inclusive of the day on which the same shall actually be paid, then the above-written obligation shall be void, but otherwise shall be of full force and effect."

A consideration of this form will shew, that if an action were brought on the bond, commenced (say) on the 1st July next, the obligor could not escape judgment being recovered against him for the penalty, unless he proved, either (first) that he had paid 1000*l.* on the 1st June, or (secondly) that on some subsequent day of June—say the 21st—he had paid 1000*l.*, together with twenty days' interest at 6*l.* per cent.

Your obedient servant,
O. L.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR AND THE "AUTHORISED" REPORTS.

THE following dialogue took place in the Lord Chancellor's Court on Wednesday, the 13th instant:—
Counsel being about to refer to a case of Ex parte Matheson, stated that it was not reported in the authorised reports.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I do not know what are the "authorised" reports.

Counsel.—I mean the reports which are understood to have the authority of the Court for their accuracy.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I know of no such reports. I hope no reporter will ever be under the direction of the judge.

Counsel then quoted the case from one of the "irregular" reports.

THE LAW of COPYRIGHT in WORKS of LITERATURE and ART, and in the Application of Designs. With the Statutes relating thereto. By CHARLES PALMER PHILLIPS, of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister at Law. In 8vo. 1863.
"Mr. Phillips has shewn, not only great diligence in collecting cases bearing upon the various topics which he has treated, but considerable judgment in the manner in which he has dealt with them. He has spared no pains to make his work reliable as a legal text-book, and at the same time equally useful to publishers, authors, artists, and other persons who are interested in works of literature, art, or design. In a word, such a book has long been wanted, and Mr. Phillips has given abundant proof of his ability to meet the desideratum."—Solicitors' Journal, Nov. 14, 1863.

"It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom, therefore, the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. The present editors have preserved this characteristic of Mr. Stone's volume in their own abundant additions to it."—Law Times.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 30, 1864.

THE appearance of the Consolidated Regulations of the several Societies of Lincoln's Inn, the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, and Gray's Inn (described more briefly as the Four Inns of Court), as to the admission of students, the mode of keeping terms, the calling of students to the Bar, the granting certificates to practice under the Bar, and legal education, shew that the Benchers have advanced another step towards a legal university.

To those who remember the time when the operations of the Bench were confined to the receipt of enormous incomes, which they applied solely to architectural or culinary purposes, and to the registration of the names of students and barristers, about whose education or fitness for the important duties of advocates or counsel, they never even affected to care at all—when lectures, if ever delivered, were unattended, and when every examination for a call, when required, was more ludicrous than a farce—to those who can carry their recollection so far back, the result of the Lord Chancellor's long-continued and successful labours in the cause of legal education will induce them to hope, that still further progress will be made in the same direction.

Hitherto each of the Inns of Court has, though no doubt after some communication with the other Inns, taken upon itself to instruct students in some one branch of the law, but different rules existed in the various Inns, both as to the admission of students and their call to the Bar.

The Benchers of all the Inns have, we think, very wisely come to the determination of issuing regulations for those purposes, common to all the Inns.

These regulations, no doubt, are susceptible of great improvement, and, most probably, will ere long be improved, but those who know anything of the constitution of the Bench, must be aware what difficulty those who wish to promote the study of the law as a science, and to advance the highest interests of the Bar, have had, and still have, to contend with, in the opposition of those, among their number, who have picked up what they possess of law merely in practice, who know little or nothing of law as a science, and who think, therefore, that it is useless or superfluous that others should enjoy advantages in studying their profession which they themselves never enjoyed, and therefore cannot appreciate.

These observations are made to account for what we consider the shortcomings of the Consolidated Regulations—they are not exactly what the party of progress among the Benchers could have wished for, but we believe they are such only as the opposite party would allow them to make.

First, with regard to the admission of students, we think that the preliminary examination before the joint board of the Four Inns for students, being persons who have not passed a public examination at any of the universities in the British dominions, constitutes scarcely a sufficient test, that the candidate for admission has received such a liberal education as to make him a desirable addition to the English Bar.

The following are the only subjects of examination:—(a). The English and Latin languages. (b). English History.

Now, we think, that, without throwing too great a burthen upon the examiners, the subjects of examination ought to have been extended to the Greek language and General History, and one modern language at least, say, either French, German, or Italian, at the option of the candidate.

With regard to the call to the Bar, we think that the Consolidated Regulations are very unsatisfactory. All that appears to be essential to a call is as follows:—The student must (first) either have attended during one whole year the lectures and private classes of two of the readers; or (secondly) have been a pupil during one year in the chambers of some barrister, certified special pleader, conveyancer, or draftsman in equity, or two or more of such persons; or (thirdly) have satisfactorily passed a general examination.

The Benchers, therefore, have not yet ventured to make a satisfactory examination compulsory upon those seeking admission to the Bar; so that if a person can shew either that he has attended lectures and private classes, or been a pupil in chambers for one whole year, although he may during that time have learnt nothing, and although at an examination he may have been most ignominiously plucked, he may still claim to be called to the Bar, and in due time he will be equally well qualified to accept one of those numerous offices for which Parliament requires a certain standing at the Bar.

The number of readers still remains the same: first, a reader on jurisprudence, and civil, and international law; secondly, a reader on the law of real property; thirdly, a reader on common law; fourthly, a reader on equity; fifthly, a reader on constitutional law and legal history.

We have often urged the propriety of appointing a separate reader for international law, for that subject has nothing more in common with jurisprudence and civil law (by which, it is presumed, the Roman law is meant) than any of the subjects allotted to any of the other readers.

The Benchers appear, however, to contemplate an additional reader some time or other on this subject, for the 30th regulation says, "that a separate course on international law shall be delivered, and shall for the present be delivered by the reader on jurisprudence and civil and international law."

The Benchers would, we think, have taken the wiser course had they at once appointed a separate reader upon international law. In making this observation, we do not for a moment wish to cast the slightest reflection upon the learned gentleman who holds the appointment of reader on jurisprudence and civil law, as well as international law; but we think that the subjects which are thrown upon him are too numerous and weighty for a single individual; the two first subjects are amply sufficient to occupy his whole time and attention.

Now that the Society of Doctors' Commons has ceased to exist, the learning which was almost peculiar to the place; viz. that of international law, falls naturally under the protection of the Inns of Court, and ought to receive that attention which its great importance demands.

Formerly we looked, in a great measure, to Doctors' Commons for a knowledge of international law, whenever any question arose between ourselves and foreign nations. The Solicitor or Attorney-General for the time being—at any rate, on first taking office—often knew little of the subject, except what he obtained by the hasty cramming of a learned civilian, or by what he picked up in the text-books, often written, as in the case in some American books, in a spirit by no means friendly to our own pretensions.

Although the judgments of our Courts upon one branch of international law are unsurpassed for their powers of reasoning, and the exhibition of the highest judicial qualities, we have no text-writers who do justice to the entire subject of international law; and the reason is, that no adequate remuneration has ever been offered sufficient to engage a man of high ability in its study and exposition.

If a good course of lectures were delivered on international law, by a reader who gave up his whole time to the subject, the Inns of Court would, with much profit, be resorted to by all persons about to enter into the diplomatic service; and, indeed, by all who wished to render themselves complete statesmen. But the subject of international law, under which term is comprehended, not merely international common law (if we may be allowed to use the expression), or that part of the law of nations which exists independent of treaty, but also all the treaties which exist between the different countries of the world, and by which their intercourse with each other is in a great measure regulated, is not only vast but intricate, and only partially explored, and the knowledge of which, by this means, would soon be diffused, would doubtless lead to many important results.

The emolument of each reader is stated to be "the fixed sum of four hundred guineas a year." We presume, in addition to this sum, they are to receive the fees paid by the students, in proportion to the number attending the private classes (34, 35). What that may amount to when added to the fixed sum of four hundred guineas, we do not know; but we believe, that the remuneration of the readers bears but a very small proportion to the large revenues of the Inns.

One improvement effected by the regulations is, that the examinations in future are not to be conducted by the reader of the class to be examined.

Lastly, we are glad to observe, that the Inns of Court are of themselves beginning to effect these improvements, without waiting for the intervention of Parliament: this, however, cannot be long delayed, unless some important change is made in the constitution of the Bench of each of the Inns of Court; but if the aid of Parliament is not necessary to effect such a change, it might be best carried out by the Inns themselves.

MR. O'MALLEY IRWIN, a name not unknown in legal circles, has published a letter, addressed to Lord Palmerston, in which he discusses, at great length, the grievous wrong which, as he alleges, Sir George Grey has done to him, and the peril to which all her Majesty's subjects are exposed should this wrong remain unredressed. Some of our readers may be aware that Mr. Irwin, under the provisions of stat. 25 & 24 Vict. c. 34 (Mr. Bovill's act), left with the Home Secretary his petition of right (relating to claims which we need not enter upon), in order that Sir George Grey might, in compliance with the 2nd section of the statute, submit the same to her Majesty, and that her Majesty might grant her fiat, that right be done to him, and that the fiat was refused. The 2nd section of the act is in the following terms:—"The said petition shall be left with the Secretary for the Home Department, in order that the same may be submitted to her Majesty, for her Majesty's gracious consideration, and in order that her Majesty, if she shall think fit, may grant her fiat that right be done, and no fee or sum of money shall be payable by the suppliant on so leaving such petition, or on his receiving such the same." Now, we understand from Mr. Irwin's letter, that the charge he makes against Sir George Grey is, not that he did not submit the petition to her Majesty, but that he advised her not to grant her fiat. If this act of Parliament is to be construed by the same rules of construction which are applied to other acts, we think it is clear that it is in the discretion of her Majesty to grant or withhold her fiat—she is to grant it "if she shall think fit," which words clearly imply an exercise of discretion. Then, what is the charge against Sir George Grey? It must be, not that in the honest performance of his duty, and in the faithful expression of his opinion on the merits of Mr. Irwin's case, he advised her Majesty not to grant the fiat, but that he was actuated by malice, or some improper motive, in advising her Majesty to withhold it. That the Queen herself could be influenced by anything but a desire to do what was just towards Mr. Irwin nobody will venture to assert, and we are at present at a loss to know what improper motive could have influenced Sir George Grey in giving the particular advice to her Majesty, which we assume he did give in Mr. Irwin's case. It was his duty to advise her Majesty upon the petition; and if he did advise her conscientiously, it is difficult to see by whom he can be called to account, however mistaken he may be in the advice which he has given. We should, therefore, have considered that Mr. Irwin was ill advised in his attack on Sir George Grey, had we not read in the first sentence of his letter, that Sir Fitzroy Kelly was about to present "A humble petition to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to grant her fiat to the petition of right." To us, who are unacquainted with the grounds on which Sir Fitzroy Kelly intends to rest his petition, this seems to be rather a strong proceeding, and to amount to an assertion that her Majesty has no discretion to exercise in the matter, and that the granting the fiat is merely a ministerial office. We have no doubt that Sir Fitzroy Kelly will adduce strong reasons in favour of his application, and that he will shew either that Sir George Gray has grossly misled her Majesty in inducing her to refuse her fiat to the petition, or that the statute renders it imperative upon her to grant it. At present we are unable to adopt either view of the case. The statute which gives the subject a new mode of obtaining redress for injuries alleged to be sustained at the hands of the Crown, gives at the same time, if words are to have their plain meaning, a discretion to the Sovereign as to the cases in which that remedy may be adopted; and it seems to contain a provision against the harsh exercise of that discretion in its 20th section, which enacts, that "nothing in this act contained shall prevent any suppliant from proceeding as before the passing of the act;" so that whatever constitutional rights the subject had before this act was passed, are still preserved to him.

Notanda.

Notanda in Law, Equity, Bankruptcy, Admiralty, Discreet, and Probate Cases. By TENISON EDWARDS, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. I, containing Notes on Cases decided in 1863. 8vo., pp. 76. [T. F. A. Day.]

In the conception of "Notanda," Mr. Edwards has originated a new and very useful design, which he has carried out with considerable ability and industry. To those who are acquainted with the plan of the work it is unnecessary to say anything, to those who are not, we may repeat the author's explanation:—

"The question is: How can the practitioner with the greatest facility make himself acquainted with the latest decisions upon any given subject? And my reply is: By looking, not through a dozen annual digests, but by looking to the standard text-books, such as Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, Williams on Executors, Jarman on Wills, &c.; and there, in juxtaposition with the topics treated of, and on the very page where the author in his next edition would introduce the modern decisions, to find clear and intelligible notes of such decisions as have been come to upon the particular topic since the edition of the work. Or, if the question turn upon the construction of a statute, to turn to the section of that statute, and there to find like clear and intelligible notes of such decisions upon that particular section. I have explained my plan in answering the above question, and I have no fear of a contradiction from any practical man.

"A little further development, and I have stated my plan. I read every judicial decision of the Queen's Courts in England and Ireland reported in the authorised and unauthorised reports, and I make from them, or such of them as are of any value, notes of the result of the decisions in the shortest, most pithy, and suggestive language that I can select; such, in fact, as I should write into my own text-books or statutes. I head the note, in the case of the construction of a statute, with the statute and the section; and in the case of it not being upon the construction of a statute, I head it with a standard text-book upon the particular subject, with the paging or other reference, such as part, chapter, and section, where the note should be placed; and, lest the edition of that book in the subscriber's library should not be the same as that from which I take my reference, I will also say, 'citing such and such a leading case,' by which means the proper reference may easily be found out by the table of cases in the text-book, and the leading case referred to may also have a note placed in its margin, if the subscriber should have a library of reports.

"These little notes are printed in very clear type, on one side only of the paper, and are intended to be severed from each other, and placed, by means of paste or gum, according to the reference at the head of each note. There are four modes in which these notes may be used. They may be affixed to the page of the book referred to; they may be copied by the clerk into the page of the book, they may be affixed to a blank page inserted in the text-book, or they may be numbered and inserted on blank sheets at the end of the book, placing a reference by its number at the page or place referred to. I take it that if a man has in his library the practical statutes of the present and last reigns, together with a dozen, or even less, of the standard text-books of the day, and that he places, or causes to be placed, these little notes where directed, he can at once lay his hands upon nine-tenths of all the modern cases, and indeed upon all the cases of ordinary practical utility. It is to be remembered that even should the subscriber not have the text-book to which I refer, yet if he have one on the same subject he may generally find the proper place in his own text-book by the topic, and the leading case cited in my text-book. I will carefully select such text-books for my references as I find best arranged as to matter and index. And having so done I will invariably refer to them, unless in exceptional cases; but should I refer to a text-book other than my regular one, I will also give a reference to my regular text-book."

To this explanation we added, in a notice of the first number of the work, the suggestion, that thirty or forty of these notelets might, if necessary, be placed opposite to a single page of a text-book, by gumming them successively to the back edge of the inner margin and to each other, still leaving the margin of the book available for written notes.

After the appearance of the first number an improvement was made, by numbering the notes consecutively, and by means of a re-issue this was extended to the notes included in the first number. The last note in the volume just completed bears the number 1637. These numbers render the actual insertion of the notes in the books of reference unnecessary; it will be sufficient to set down the number of the note, although, for general purposes, it is more satisfactory and convenient to have the name and abstract made.

The volume contains a table of cases, an index of subject-matters, and a separate index of reference to decisions on statutes, section by section, which will render the work available as a digest if the notes are not cut up for distribution; and it is suggested, that those subscribers who cut up the notes should keep a blank book to receive, under appropriate divisions, such of the notes as refer to text-books or statutes not in their library.

We think that Mr. Edwards deserves great credit for the enterprise and ability with which he has carried on his very useful undertaking, and we heartily wish him success. Indeed, the discontinuance of the publication would be a serious inconvenience to ourselves, and, we presume, to a large majority of the subscribers.

We hope that he will reconsider that alteration of his plan, announced in a recent number, which consists in rejecting such cases as he considers to involve no new point of doctrine or practice. Few lawyers would like to rely on any other judgment than their own as to the value of any decision in point; and it is, besides, often important to know whether a decision, which may appear to be doubtful or unsound, has or has not been repeatedly followed in identical cases.

A Manual of Equity Jurisprudence, founded on the Works of Story, Spence, and other Writers, and on the subsequent Cases, comprising the Fundamental Principles, and the Points of Equity usually occurring in General Practice. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., Q.C. Seventh Edition. [Stevens, Sons, & Haynes. 1864.]

MR. SMITH'S Manual of Equity Jurisprudence has fairly won for itself the position of a standard work upon the important subject of which it treats. Its great utility to the student has long been acknowledged; and the present edition has been made peculiarly valuable to practitioners, by the author carrying out a plan, commenced in the two former editions, of inserting such further points, to be found in the authorised reports, as appeared requisite to be noticed in a book of this kind, in addition to those numerous and accurate propositions which he has with so much care deduced or enunciated from the bulky treatises of Story and Spence. This plan renders the Manual a supplement to the works of Story and Spence, and therefore highly useful to those practitioners who are in the habit of consulting those able works.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

THE Bankrupt Act of 1861, by no means rarely furnishes the Courts with questions of construction for their consideration, which shew how difficult it is, in a measure so framed, to foresee and provide for all the cases which may fall within some of its provisions. General language is occasionally used, without the addition of an exception or proviso, rendering a strong decision apparently necessary, in order to avoid the inconvenience or injustice which would arise from a strict construction of a loose statute.

The provision in the Bankrupt Act of 1861 to which we would call attention is the 137th section, the decision upon which we desire to make a few remarks, is the case of Ex parte Roberts, re Holden (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 28). The words of the section are as follows:—"At any time after the expiration of twelve months from adjudication, or at any other earlier period with the approbation of the court, the assignees may sell by auction or tender, or, with the sanction of the court, by private contract, all or any of the book debts due, or growing due, to the bankrupt, and the books relating thereto, and the goodwill of his trade or business, and assign the same to the purchaser; and such purchaser shall, by virtue of the assignment, have power to sue in his own name for the debts assigned to him, as effectually, and with the same privileges concerning proof of the requisites of bankruptcy and other matters, as the assignee himself." (Sect. 137).

Now, it seems to be tolerably obvious, on the reading of this section, that the intention of the Legislature must have been, that the books and book debts should be sold, not separately from, but together with, the goodwill; and the reason doubtless was, that the goodwill of any business would produce a larger price, if, at the same time that a person purchased it, he became also the purchaser of the books (by which he would be able to ascertain who were the customers of the concern), and of the book debts (by becoming the owner of which, he might be able to retain such an amount of influence over the debtors as might induce them, if treated with some forbearance, to continue to deal with him). If such were the object of the section, no objection can be taken to it, at any rate, so far as concerns the sale of the goodwill and debts of ordinary traders; but even in the case of such traders, if their debts were to be sold apart from the goodwill, instead of being collected and got in by the assignees, it may readily be foreseen, that a traffic in debts due to bankrupts would soon spring up among those individuals, who, under the names of different professions or callings, live, and evidently thrive, in the atmosphere of the bankrupt courts; and the gains to be made by the sums recovered on such debts, would not be diminished by the addition of costs, which debtors might be compelled to pay when litigation was, perhaps, not too tardily commenced by some enterprising attorney.

The case of Pooley v. Quiller (2 De G. & J. 327), and the excellent judgments of the Lord Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, shew in a very clear light the evils of a person, filling the office of assignee and accountant to the assignees of a bankrupt, becoming the purchaser of dividends due to creditors of the bankrupt. The case of Ex parte Roberts, re Holden, lately heard by the Lord Chancellor, shews the evils which would result by the sale of the debts due to bankrupts, especially when engaged in some professions, to accountants, and such persons. In that case, it appeared that solicitors, who had carried on business together in partnership, became bankrupt. The manager of the estate, with the authority of the assignees, sold the books and book debts of the firm to an accountant (but whether he also bought the business at the same time does not appear to be clear from the report). Upon the accountant presenting a petition to the Lord Chancellor, praying that the assignees might be ordered to carry out the sale, his Lordship dismissed the petition. According to the construction which his Lordship put upon the section, it only authorised the sale of "book debts, and the books relating thereto," when it could lawfully be done. The sale in the case before him was, his Lordship said, "an extremely wrong thing; and it only shewed that the assignees, and the solicitors of the assignees in that instance, had not attended to their duties." The evils attendant upon such a sale would, doubtless, be great. It would, as the Lord Chancellor observed, "put into the market some of the most confidential communications between a solicitor and his clients. If the prayer of the petition were granted, there might be numerous applications by clients to restrain such an improper publication of the affairs of the client, as the sale of a solicitor's books by public auction."

As to the impropriety of such a sale there is no doubt, but the question which the assignees had to consider was, whether it was legal, as being authorised by the act; and upon reading it attentively, it seems to be so authorised.

Whether they acted discreetly in making the sale in such a case is doubtful, but if any blame is to be attached to the assignees or their solicitors for the sale, it ought to be borne at least equally by the Legislature, who, when they enacted that the book debts and books of bankrupts might be sold, could easily have excepted the book debts and books of persons carrying on certain businesses or professions, where the sale would be to the prejudice of those who dealt with them.

ERRATUM.—In the Leading Article of last week, p. 32, col. 1, line 25 from bottom, for "exploded," read "explored."

AT the commencement of every session of Parliament we naturally look to the Queen's Speech for a few sentences foreshadowing some proposed alteration or improvement in the law.

The Queen's Speech just delivered can scarcely be said to do more than allude in the most general terms, and in less than two lines, to what may be expected next session in the shape of law reform. In the speech it is said, that "various measures of public usefulness will be submitted for your consideration." This part of the speech does not condescend to particulars, nor can it be said to promise much. It is, however, convenient to avoid details, as the various measures may, perhaps, not yet have been thought of, but may turn up during the course of the session, and will then be brought before Parliament, in a shape well calculated, from the amount of thought and care bestowed upon their preparation, to make them take their place fitly by the side of the majority of the acts in our Statute Book, including the last Bankruptcy Act.

Perhaps, also, it is well for the Government to promise little, for when little is promised, no disappointment is felt when little is done, as is naturally the case when small performances follow "great expectations."

Perhaps the parsimony of Mr. Gladstone opposes insurmountable obstacles to the great plans long since spoken of, but not yet commenced, by the Lord Chancellor.

THE case of Swan v. The North British Australasian Company (32 L. J., Ex., 273; 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 102) is one which deserves attentive consideration, on account of the different views entertained and expressed by the judges before whom it was argued, on one branch of the law of estoppel. The facts were, that Mr. Swan, being the owner of some shares in the defendants' company, and also of shares in another Australian company, at the instance of one Oliver, his broker, executed blank transfers, for the purpose of enabling Oliver to fill in the numbers and descriptions of the shares in the latter company, which were the shares he intended to transfer. The certificates of the shares in the defendants' company, which, according to their regulations, it was necessary to produce in order to get transfers registered, had been left by Swan in a box, which was under Oliver's care, but of which Swan kept the key. Oliver fraudulently filled in the blank transfers, which had been so executed by Swan, the numbers and descriptions of Swan's shares in the defendants' company, and sold them. He also got a duplicate key to the box without Swan's knowledge, and took out the certificates, and was thus enabled to procure a transfer of the shares in the defendants' company. When Swan discovered the transaction, he required the purchasers to retransfer the shares to him, which they refused to do; and he required the defendants to restore his name to the register, which they also refused. Under these circumstances, the defendants contended that Swan was estopped by his negligence from disputing the title of the purchasers to the shares. In the Court of Exchequer the judges were divided in opinion; Pollock, C. B., and Wilde, B., considering that Swan was so estopped; Martin and Channell, BB., considering that the law of estoppel, founded on negligence, did not apply to deeds; and also, that even if it did, the facts did not shew such negligence in Swan as would create an estoppel. (31 L. J., Ex., 425; 8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 940).

We should also mention that the case had already come before the Court of Common Pleas, upon an application by Swan against the defendants, under the Joint-stock Companies Acts, to compel them to restore him to the register, and that the judges in that court were also equally divided; Erle, C. J., and Keating, J., being of opinion that there was an estoppel by negligence; Williams and Willes, JJ., being of the contrary opinion. (30 L. J., C. P., 113). The counsel for the company, on the several occasions on which the case has been argued, founded their arguments in favour of the estoppel, on the well-known case of Pickard v. Sears (6 Ad. & El. 469), and other similar cases, and contended that the law, which applies to negotiable instruments, as laid down in Young v. Grote (4 Bing. 253), applied also to deeds. The counsel for Swan contended, that the law had never been extended to deeds, and was limited to negotiable instruments. All the authorities on the point are cited by the judges or the counsel, and eventually the Court of Error (dissentiente Keating, J.), decided in favour of Swan; but as their judgments are founded principally upon the opinion which they had arrived at, that there had not been such negligence on Swan's part as to create an estoppel, the important question, whether this law of estoppel is applicable to the case of forged deeds, can hardly be said to have been determined. It may be that the law should be so extended, but we do not think that at present there is any authority for such an extension. Pickard v. Sears, of which the late Chief Justice Jervis once said, "that it was a case which had a great deal to answer for," has, we think, given rise to some rather wild notions on the law of estoppel. It is qualified, to a certain extent, by Freeman v. Cooke (2 Exch. 654); but even so qualified, we can hardly think it is an authority for holding that a forged deed shall be considered a valid one. The doctrine laid down in Young v. Grote, as to negotiable instruments, which form part of the currency, and stand upon a peculiar footing, has never been extended to conveyances of property by deed; and Williams, J., observes, in his judgment in the Court of Common Pleas, "that it is doubtful whether the cases, as to the liability of a man who signs a blank bill, or note, or cheque, are founded on the doctrine of estoppel, or on a rule of the law merchant, that an actual authority is thereby conferred on the person in whose hands the instrument is, "and that it would be inconvenient and dangerous to apply the principle of them any further."

We would particularly recommend the judgment of Martin, B., for perusal; the doctrine of estoppel is fully discussed in it, and the authorities cited and commented upon. The question is certainly an important one. The extension of the rule to deeds might, as is pointed out by some of the judges, lead to very serious consequences, while, on the other hand, an innocent person may occasionally suffer if it is not to be so extended. There must, however, be clear and definite rules of law, and there must always be some cases of hardship, in the application of those rules, and we are disposed to think that this law of estoppel has been carried quite far enough.

MR. JUSTICE SHEE AND THE HOME CIRCUIT.—The members of the Home Circuit, to the number of at least 180, entertained Mr. Justice Shee at dinner, at the Albion Tavern, in Aldersgate-street, on Thursday, the 28th February. Mr. Montagu Chambers presided; and Lord Chelmsford, Mr. Justice Willes, Baron Channell, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Sir Erskine Perry, and the Recorder of London (all at one period or another members of the Circuit) were guests.

MR. O'MALLEY IRWIN'S REPLY TO THE COMMENTATOR IN "THE JURIST," OF THE 30TH JANUARY, 1864.

We insert, at Mr. O'Malley Irwin's request, a letter which we have received from him, and his observations on our article relating to his petition of right, which appeared in THE JURIST of Saturday, January 30:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE JURIST.'"

"Queen's Hotel, Burlington Gardens,
Feb. 1, 1864."

"Sir,—As you have opened your columns to some comments upon my Pamphlet, in relation to Petition of Right, which I addressed to Lord Palmerston, I beg, on behalf of myself and every British subject, that you will kindly favour me by the insertion of my reply.

"I have the honour to be,

"Your obedient servant,

"GEORGE O'MALLEY IRWIN."

It is to be regretted that a question of such grave and constitutional import has not devolved on abler hands than mine, to assert and defend the indefeasible right of petition; but I hope no British subject will hereafter suffer through any want of zeal and devotedness to the cause of that right on my part, or through the want of any straining of whatever humble capacity and means I may possess.

The constitutional right, which the subject, by virtue of the 1st section of the Petition of Right Act, 1860, is entitled to ask, forms the ground on which Sir Fitzroy Kelly rests the right, that my petition be heard before her Majesty's judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. This common-law right and statute afford a discretion only to the Sovereign to be graciously pleased to satisfy the demand of the petitioner without further suit, in all cases which her Majesty knows to be manifestly just; but in a case where there is doubt and difficulty involved, her Majesty must graciously be pleased to indorse her royal order, that it be brought before her judges of the court, and the venue selected by the petitioner under sect. 1, without ministerial authority being substituted in lieu of the proper judicial tribunal appointed by statute for the trial of such petition.

This statute, by the words "if she shall think fit," has preserved to the Sovereign the royal protective prerogative, in accordance with ancient usages of the realm and of her Majesty's royal predecessors, to satisfy the just demand of the subject, without his being forced to incur the expense of litigation with the Sovereign; and in cases of doubt and difficulty referred to, it has deprived the Sovereign even of the power of choosing the court and venue previously possessed; therefore, such cases must now be let go before the judges or the jury for trial, and cannot be decided in private, and in their own favour by the parties themselves, whose misconduct or errors form the ground of the petition of right. Apparently, while such abuses are extant, we have not obliterated the tyranny of the Star Chamber.

As to malice, it is not necessary that it should be alleged, for where a party, no matter how dignified or exalted a personage, acts illegally, malice is presumed. (See Phillips on Evidence).

Your commentator urges an assumption to supercede trial by jury—it is unnecessary to say more on that head, than that the British constitution repudiates such a doctrine. I claim, therefore, as a British subject, the benefit of the law, and that everything be proved before the proper judicial tribunal which I have chosen, and which no subsequent section of the act can be so construed as to have repealed or nullified. To make sect. 2 repeal or nullify sect. 1, is such an absurdity as must provoke the disapproval of every British subject, and especially any individual who is excluded from the remedial provisions of the Petitions of Right Act, by an order of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, forbidding a writ to be issued out of that court at the suit of that particular individual.

There is no difficulty in seeing that the party injured is the proper party to call Sir George Grey, as her Majesty's Secretary of State, to account "for the errors or misconduct by which the Queen has been advised by him, and induced to do a temporary injustice," as well as for the injuries resulting therefrom. Sir George Grey, as Secretary of State, by his advice to the Queen, "not to let right be done in the petition of right," sets himself up above all law, judges, jury, courts of appeal, and even the constitution itself, to which her Majesty has sworn allegiance.

The comment made on sect. 20 has only strengthened the subject's right. The Petitions of Right Act having been superadded to the common-law right of the subject, does not deprive him of the right which he previously had "ex debito justitiæ," of proceeding against the Crown, but secures it against the possibility of the Crown's encroachments, or the subject being circumvented, as in Re Perring (2 M. & W. 873), by the Crown choosing the court. It is well known that the rights and liberties of British subjects are not depending on the mercy or discretion of even the Crown itself, much less of Sir George Grey, as Secretary of State, or any adviser of the Crown, for the laws of this country are our birthrights.

GEORGE O'MALLEY IRWIN.

THE COMMITTEE ON LAW REPORTING.—The committee appointed at the meeting of the Bar held in Lincoln's-inn Hall on the 2nd December, 1863, under the presidency of the Attorney-General, to prepare a plan for the amendment of the present system of preparing, editing, and publishing reports of judicial decisions, and to report thereon to a future meeting of the Bar, have issued the following circular to the members of the Bar:—"The committee thus appointed are anxious, in order the better to discharge the duty intrusted to them, to collect the opinion of the Profession upon the subject of law reporting; and for that purpose the committee are desirous of receiving any observations which you, either alone, or in conjunction with others, may be so obliging as to make upon what, in your opinion, are the advantages or disadvantages of the present system, and also any suggestions, either as to the principle or details of any amendment of the existing system which you may think desirable. The committee will meet on Thursday, the 18th February next, to consider any suggestions with which they may have been favoured in the meantime."

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—A meeting of this Society took place at its rooms, 4, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, on Monday, the 1st February, W. M. Best, Esq., V. P., in the chair, when Mr. C. Clark read a paper on "The Principles that ought to govern the Conduct of Neutrals and Belligerents." The Chairman having addressed the meeting, the discussion on the paper was adjourned, on the motion of Mr. Westlake.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 13, 1864.

THE Home Secretary has lost no time in endeavouring to remove from our law the possibility of a recurrence of the scandal caused by the case of George Victor Townley, to which we drew attention in a recent number (ante, p. 23). He has brought the following bill into the House of Commons:—

"Sect. 1. The 1st section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, is hereby repealed.

"2. If any person while imprisoned in any prison, or other place of confinement, under any sentence of death, transportation, penal servitude, or imprisonment, or under a charge of any offence, or for not finding bail for good behaviour, or to keep the peace, or to answer a criminal charge, or in consequence of any summary conviction or order by any justice or justices of the peace or under any other than civil process, shall appear to be insane, it shall be lawful, if such person is confined in a prison to which visiting justices are appointed, for two or more of the visiting justices of such prison, or if such person is in any other place of confinement, for two or more justices of the peace of the county, city, borough, or place in which such place of confinement is situate, and such visiting or other justices are hereby required to call to their assistance two physicians or surgeons, or one physician and one surgeon, duly registered as such respectively, under the provisions of an act passed in the session of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, and to be selected by them for that purpose, and to inquire, with their aid, as to the insanity of such person; and if it shall be duly certified by such justices, or any two of them, and such physicians or surgeons, or such physician and surgeon, that such person is insane, one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State may, upon receipt of such certificate, if he shall think fit, direct, by warrant under his hand, that such person shall be removed to such lunatic asylum or other proper receptacle for insane persons as the said Secretary of State may judge proper and appoint; and every person so removed under this act, or already removed and in custody under any former act relating to insane prisoners not under civil process, shall remain in confinement in such asylum or other proper receptacle as aforesaid, or in any other lunatic asylum or other proper receptacle to which such person may be removed by any like warrant which the Secretary of State is hereby empowered to issue, if he shall think fit, until it shall be duly certified to the said Secretary of State by two physicians or surgeons, or one physician and one surgeon, duly registered as aforesaid, that such person is sane, and upon the receipt of such last-mentioned certificate the said Secretary of State is hereby authorised to issue a warrant under his hand directing, if the period of imprisonment or custody of such person shall have expired, that he or she shall be discharged, or if such person shall still remain subject to be continued in custody, that he or she shall be removed to any prison or other place of confinement in which he or she may be lawfully confined; provided, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to repeal the 38th section of the act of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, or any part thereof.

"3. All the provisions of the first-mentioned act which are not hereby repealed, and all the provisions of an act passed in the session of the 23 and 24 Vict., intituled, 'An Act to make better Provision for the Custody and Care of Criminal Lunatics,' shall apply to lunatics removed under this act in all respects as if they had been removed under the section of the first-mentioned act which is hereby repealed."

The effect of this will be to repeal the 1st section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, and substitute a fresh enactment, by which the certificate of insanity must come from two of the visiting justices, and from two medical men chosen by those justices, and duly registered under the Medical Act; and, when given, it is not to be final or conclusive on the Home Secretary, who is bound to act on it only "if he thinks fit."

It is impossible to disapprove of the principle of this bill; the only question is, whether it goes far enough. After all, it leaves the sanity of a convicted murderer or other criminal, and his consequent escape from punishment, to be determined by a secret tribunal; and although it may be said that such has ever been the practice, our experience of it,—especially of late years, when such extravagant notions on the subject of insanity are found in so many members of the medical profession, and such strange sympathy with criminals in general pervades the community—is hardly such as to enamour the community.

The law will, doubtless, be altered, so as to prevent a repetition of the Townley scandal; but the whole affair gives rise to a more important, and not very agreeable reflexion, namely, what is the exact value of that medical testimony which we see every day adduced in our courts on the most serious questions, and too often received as oracular. Look at Townley's case as it now stands. An individual is indicted for murder, and the fashionable defence of insanity is set up. Dr. Winslow—a gentleman of unquestioned respectability, and of large experience in the treatment of the insane—deposes to the fact, as also does the surgeon of the prison—a gentleman who afterwards makes the admission, that almost until the moment of trial he had not made up his mind on the subject. The prisoner is convicted, in manifest contempt of Dr. Winslow and his (scientific?) theory of moral insanity, uncontrollable impulse, &c. As, however, the judge thought some inquiry on the subject necessary, the Home Secretary issues a commission to the Commissioners in Lunacy to inquire into it, who make the following report:—

"The result of the examination of the officials of the prison, of which the detail will be found appended to our report, may be stated briefly as in effect establishing, without dispute, that there has been substantially no change in the prisoner's mental state since the trial; that such difference or alteration as may have been noted has been an improvement; and that he has been altogether more at ease, more resigned, and at times even cheerful, since the sentence was passed upon him. Not at any time since he was first brought to the gaol, according to the testimony of all who have had the means of watching him closely, does he appear to have been more rational than he is at present.

"In the endeavour to form a satisfactory opinion as to his existing mental state, we have found it impossible to exclude the consideration of what his mental condition had been during the entire period of his imprisonment. What it is now it has been throughout; and the detail of what was elicited from him at our interviews, appended to this report, is probably sufficiently ample to enable the Secretary of State to form an opinion for himself as to the prisoner's moral condition, the views entertained by him of the murder he committed, the motives that impelled him to it, and the reasons by which he justifies it. We have to remark, that generally his manner during these interviews, with one or two exceptions which we have noted, was remarkably calm, quiet, and self-possessed; and though he seems to have had no difficulty in at once, from the questions put to him, correctly inferring the object and drift of our examination, we saw not the least grounds of suspecting him of any intention to mislead us by putting on a manner not natural to him, or feigning what he did not feel.

"In view of the extravagant opinions thus deliberately professed by him, of his extraordinarily perverted moral sense, and of the hereditary taint alleged, and apparently proved, to have existed in the family of the prisoner's grandmother, we cannot consider him to be of sound mind; but his views of right and wrong, false as they are, appear to have been coherently acted upon, and with a full sense of what they involved. He reasons now, as he acted in committing the murder. Upon the point of his alleged belief in a conspiracy against him we pressed him very closely; but we could not satisfy ourselves that this was in the nature of a delusion. It seems certain that some members of the deceased's family objected to his engagement with her, while others favoured it, or were indifferent; and that the former had obtained an influence over her some little time before her letter was written, which was meant finally to put an end to it. Hence he believed that she had been acted upon by a conspiracy, which was meant 'in the tenderest point' to injure him; and all the questions which we put upon this part of the case failed to draw from him anything that could bear other construction than that he had taken a disordered and morbid view of an actual occurrence.

"Being of opinion, therefore, that the prisoner continues to be now in the same mental state as when he committed the murder and underwent his trial, we think, that, applying the law as laid down by Mr. Baron Martin to this case, the prisoner George Victor Townley was justly convicted.

"W. G. CAMPBELL.

"JAMES WILKES.

"JOHN FORSTER."

The Home Secretary, of course, could not act on this document: but in the meantime two justices of the peace, selected by the prisoner's agent from the whole county and borough of Derby, and two medical men from the whole kingdom (one of them, as it now appears, not on the medical register, although he has, it is said, frequently signed similar documents), send a formal certificate to the Secretary of State that the prisoner is "insane"—an expression thoroughly ambiguous, for it may mean either that the prisoner is not in a state to be responsible for his actions, or that his mind is unsound sufficiently to support a commission of lunacy; which latter is no impeachment whatever of the propriety of the verdict. This precious document the Home Secretary holds (erroneously, as we trust we have shewn in our former article on this subject) obligatory on him, under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, s. 1, and makes an order for the transfer of the prisoner to an asylum for the insane. After this has been done, and consequently when the mischief was completed, a new light breaks in on the Home Secretary. With the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, he issues a fresh commission of inquiry, addressed to the eminent medical persons whose names are appended to it, who make the following report, at total variance with that of the Commissioners in Lunacy:—

"Bethlehem Royal Hospital, Jan. 28, 1864.

"We, the undersigned, having been requested by Secretary Sir George Grey to examine into the state of mind of George Victor Townley, a prisoner under sentence of death in Bethlehem Hospital, and to report our opinion as to whether he is of unsound mind, report as follows:—

"We have carefully considered the copies of papers supplied to us, and on the 26th and 27th days of this month we have had two lengthened interviews with the prisoner, and the conclusion at which we have unanimously arrived is that George Victor Townley is of sound mind.

"The demeanour of the prisoner during each interview was calm and self-possessed, with the exception that at the commencement of the second interview he displayed and expressed annoyance at the repeated examinations to which he was being subjected. Neither in mode of speech, nor in look and conduct, was there any sign of insanity observable in him.

"His prompt apprehension of the purport of our questions, and the manner in which he replied to them, indicated the possession of good intellectual capacity.

"The opinions which he avows that men, as the creatures of circumstance, are not justly responsible for their actions, are opinions at which he appears to have arrived by ordinary processes of reasoning.

"That he knows that he is responsible for the commission of crime is made clear by his own words, used to us, 'I expected to be hanged because I killed her, and am not such a fool as not to know that the law hangs for murder. I did not think of it at the time, or I should not have done it.'

"We think that this statement, that he killed Miss Goodwin to repossess himself of her as his property was an afterthought, adopted to justify his crime. He acknowledged to us that he had come to this opinion after the deed was done.

"The supposition that he killed Miss Goodwin under the influence of the opinion that in so doing he was repossessing himself of her as his property is inconsistent with his own repeated statement to us that, without forethought of any kind, he killed her under the influence of sudden impulse.

"He explained to us that, by killing Miss Goodwin to repossess himself of her as his property, he simply meant that he took her out of the hands of his enemies, and placed her in a position where she would wait, and where he would rejoin her when he died.

"The prisoner endeavoured to represent the catastrophe to us as due to the influence of sudden impulse, but the details which we elicited from him shew that he used threats of murder for some time before he struck the first blow. We think that his clear memory of the events attending the crime, and also the attempts which he has made to misrepresent the state of his mind and memory at the time of these events, are evidence of his sanity.

"We are of opinion that he does not entertain any delusion on the subject of a conspiracy against him, but that he uses the term 'conspiracy' to express the real opposition which he has met with from the members of Miss Goodwin's family to his engagement with her, and also to express the feeling that they are hostile to him.

"We have considered the evidence of hereditary predisposition to insanity, given in the papers supplied to us, and our opinion of the state of the prisoner's mind has not been altered thereby.

"We examined the apothecary, and also the chief attendant at Bethlehem, as to the conduct of Townley since he has been in detention at the hospital—both of them have had him under daily and special observation—and they assure us, that neither in conduct, manner, nor conversation, had they been able to observe in him any of the peculiarities which they are in the habit of remarking among the insane.

"W. CHARLES HOOD, M.D., Visitor of Chancery Lunatics.

"JOHN CHARLES BUCKNILL, M.D., Visitor of Chancery Lunatics.

"JOHN MEYER, M.D., Medical Superintendent of the Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

"W. HARRIS, M.D., Medical Superintendent of the Royal Bethlehem Hospital."

On receipt of this certificate, which, if true, disproves the allegation that Townley was insane, in any sense of that word known to the law, the Home Secretary deems it improper to send Townley back to his prison, and let justice take its course; and accordingly, still with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, commutes his sentence to penal servitude for life, the favourite punishment of the day, the inefficiency of which is but too well known; and which practically means, that in the course of a few years, Mr. Townley will be at liberty, with a ticket of leave, if not among ourselves, at least in some of our colonies, to seek some other Miss Goodwin to be the object of his affections or his crimes.

The efforts that are constantly made to rescue criminals from the punishment, not only of death, but every other, and their too frequent success, together with the general operation of the ticket-of-leave system, must necessarily tend to increase crime, from the conviction they generate in the minds of the criminal portion of the community of the uncertainty of the infliction of punishment for any offence, however clearly proved. If it were once distinctly understood that the law means what it says—that murder shall be punished with death, means that murder shall be punished with death; that penal servitude for life, or a specified term of years, means penal servitude for life, or for that term of years; and that those persons who wantonly interfere to save a criminal from just punishment are bad citizens, and enemies to the peace of their country, we should soon see the establishment of a healthy state of society.

Prideaux's Precedents in Conveyancing, with Dissertations on its Law and Practice. Fourth Edition. By FREDERICK PRIDEAUX and JOHN WHITCOMBE, both of Lincoln's Inn, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes. 1864.]

THE very useful work of Mr. Prideaux was presented to the profession during its first three editions in one volume. It has now very deservedly arrived at its fourth edition, and it has been extended to two volumes.

The plan of the authors appears to be, to give before each head of conveyancing, forming a separate subject, a short dissertation, where the reader may at once satisfy himself upon most of the points which usually occur under it in practice.

The work contains precedents on the following subject:—Conditions of Sale, Agreements, Purchase Deeds, Covenants for Production, Mortgages, Bills of Sale, Leases, Settlements, Wills, Disclaimers, Appointments of New Trustees, Disentailing Assurances, Partition Deeds, Bonds, Releases and Indemnities, Copartnership Deeds, Composition Deeds, Memorials, Notices, Powers of Attorney and Miscellaneous Deeds.

The precedents under these different heads are numerous, and comprehend nearly every instrument ordinarily used in conveyancing practice. They are drawn in clear and precise language, and great care has evidently been taken in their preparation, for while the authors seem never to adopt the dangerous, or at any rate unnecessary, innovations which are to be found in some collections of precedents, they have at the same time avoided the verbiage which disgraced the forms in the older books, and which has, owing to such publications as the present, become almost obsolete.

To the precedents are also appended very useful notes, calling the attention of the draftsman to points which, in the hurry of practice, may escape his recollection, and which could not be so well or so usefully noticed in the dissertation.

At the end of the work is an Appendix, containing some recent acts, which it is important that the conveyancer should always have before him, viz. the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145 (Lord Cranworth's Act); 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53 (the Lord Chancellor's Land Registry Act); and the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67 (the Declaration of Title Act, 1862, another of Lord Cranworth's Acts). These acts are prefaced by some observations of Mr. Roger Walters on the Land Registry Act and Declaration of Title Act.

The latter act seems to be a complete failure, as not a single declaration of title has been made under it; the failure of the former act has not been complete, but partial.

Mr. Watters says, that it appears from a report made to Parliament, that there have been only thirty-four applications for registration; and of these only three titles have been actually registered.

"We are not informed," he adds, "how many of these applications failed; but, of course, the costs of failures must be taken into consideration in estimating the public benefits arising from the measure." And in answer to those who impute the failure of the act to the jealousy or self-interest of the legal profession, he says, "Before seeking to impute the want of success of the measure to the opposition of the profession, it would be well to know how many of the thirty-four applicants for registration were members of the majority in the two Houses of Parliament who voted in favour of the bill."

Whatever may be the cause of the total, or almost total, failure of the acts of the two noble and learned Lords last referred to, one thing is certain, that the practice of conveyancers remains the same, and that such books as the Collection of Precedents of Mr. Priedaux and his able colleague, Mr. Whitcombe, will still be the guides, by reference to which the various instruments by which property is disposed of or affected must as heretofore be framed.

Observations on the recent Decisions in Honywood v. Forster and Gibbons v. Snape, that, under the Fines and Recoveries Act, a Copyhold disentailing Deed must be entered on the Court Rolls within Six Months. By S. SPENCER WIGG, Esq., of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. 8vo., pp. 24. [Sweet.]

THE 41st section of the Fines and Recoveries Act provides, with respect to lands not of copyhold tenure, that no disposition of lands (except certain leases) shall have any operation under the act, unless the assurance be inrolled in Chancery within six calendar months after execution; and the 46th section provides, that the consent of a protector to a disposition of lands under the act, if given by a distinct deed, shall be void, unless the deed is inrolled at or before the time when the assurance is inrolled.

The 50th section enacts, "that all the previous clauses in this act, so far as circumstances and the different tenures will admit, shall apply to lands held by copy of court roll, except that a disposition of any such lands under this act by a tenant in tail thereof, whose estate shall be an estate at law, shall be by surrender; and except that a disposition of any such lands by a tenant in tail thereof, whose estate shall be merely an estate in equity, may be made either by surrender or by a deed as hereinafter provided; and except so far as such clauses are otherwise altered or varied by the clauses hereinafter contained."

The 51st section provides, that if the consent of the protector to the disposition of copyhold lands by a tenant in tail is given by deed, the deed shall, at or before the time when the surrender is made, be executed by the protector, and produced to the lord or steward, and the consent shall be void unless the deed is so executed and produced; and the steward is to indorse an acknowledgment of the production of the deed within the time limited, and inrol the deed and indorsement. And the indorsement, purporting to be signed by the steward, is to be prima facie evidence of the facts. By sect. 52, provision is made for taking the consent of the protector in person.

By sect. 53, an equitable tenant in tail of copyholds "shall have full power by deed to dispose of such lands under this act, in the same manner in every respect as he could have done if they had been of freehold tenure; and all the previous clauses in this act shall, so far as circumstances will admit, apply to the lands in respect of which any such equitable tenant in tail shall avail himself of this present clause, and the deed by which the disposition shall be effected shall be entered on the court rolls of the manor of which the lands thereby disposed may be parcel. And if there shall be a protector to consent to the disposition, and such protector shall give his consent by a distinct deed, the consent shall be void, unless the deed of consent be executed by the protector either on or at any time before the day on which the deed of disposition shall be executed by the equitable tenant in tail; and such deed of consent shall be entered on the court rolls, and it shall be imperative on the lord, &c., when required so to do, to enter such deed or deeds on the court rolls; and he shall indorse on each deed a memorandum, signed by him, testifying the entry of the same on the court rolls: provided, that every deed by which lands held by copy of court roll shall be disposed of under this clause by an equitable tenant in tail thereof, shall be void against any person claiming such lands, or any of them, for valuable consideration, under any subsequent assurance, duly entered on the court rolls, unless the deed of disposition by the equitable tenant in tail be entered on the court rolls before the subsequent assurance shall have been entered."

SECT. 54 provides, "that in no case where any disposition, under this act, of lands held by copy of court roll, by a tenant in tail thereof, shall be effected by surrender or by deed, shall the surrender, or the memorandum, or a copy thereof, or the deed of disposition, or the deed, if any, by which the protector shall consent to the disposition, require inrolment otherwise than by entry on the court rolls."

In Honywood v. Forster (7 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1264; 30 Beav. 1), the Master of the Rolls held, that a deed of disposition by an equitable tenant in tail of copyholds did not operate under the 53rd section of the act, because it was not entered on the court rolls within six months after execution; and the reasons given for the decision were, that the Legislature could not have intended to allow an indefinite time, because the consequence of such allowance would be, that an apparent title and enjoyment under the settlement might be defeated at any time within twenty, or possibly forty, years from the death of the tenant in tail who executed the assurance—that a reasonable time, and therefore, and also because all the previous clauses were to apply so far as circumstances would admit, the time expressly fixed by the act in other cases must have been intended.

This decision was followed by the Master of the Rolls, and on appeal by the Lords Justices, in the case of Gibbons v. Snape (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1096), the Court of Appeal adopting the reasons given by Sir J. Romilly in the earlier case.

The Fines and Recoveries Act came into operation thirty years ago, and during that time it is probable, that in very many cases the inrolment of deeds intended to operate under the 53rd section, has been delayed beyond six months, in reliance on the general opinion of the profession, that no time was limited by the act for the inrolment of such deeds.

The construction which has been adopted by the Court, appears to us to be clearly inconsistent with the language and meaning of the statute. In the clauses referring to copyholds, no time for inrolment is expressly limited; and if a limit is to be understood, it must either be in consequence of the importation by the 50th section, of something from the 41st section, or by inference from the policy of the act.

Now, the 41st section, so far as it could apply to copyholds, requires that the assurance shall be inrolled in Chancery within six calendar months after the execution thereof; but a deed intended to operate under the 53rd section, is by that section required to be entered on the court rolls, without any express limit of time. And the 54th section says, that such deed shall not require inrolment otherwise than by entry on the court rolls. The grammatical construction is clear and unquestionable. Inrolment in Chancery within six calendar months is dispensed with. Entry on the court rolls is substituted, and no time is limited. That this was understood, and intended to be the meaning and effect of the act, is abundantly clear from the circumstance, that wherever in the act inrolment in Chancery is mentioned, it is in connexion with the limit of time, but no limit is ever suggested in the case of copyholds. And in the provision for the disposition of a bankrupt's copyholds (sect. 59), the difference of intention is clearly and emphatically marked. "Every deed by which any commissioner, &c., shall, under this act, dispose of lands not held by copy of court roll, shall be void, unless inrolled in Chancery within six calendar months after the execution thereof; and every deed by which any commissioner, &c., shall under this act dispose of lands held by copy of court roll, shall be entered on the court rolls of the manor;" not a word being said in the case of copyholds of any limit of time.

The suggestion of hardship or inconvenience is unfounded. Purchasers are protected by the provision giving priority to the disposition which is first inrolled, whereas, in cases not within the act, not only heirs but purchasers for value, are still liable to be turned out of possession by the production of a secret conveyance, made possibly by a remainderman sixty or even a hundred years before it is acted on.

These are the broad grounds on which we agree with Mr. Wigg, in condemning the construction which has been put upon the statute; and these, with other arguments against that construction, will be found very ably stated in Mr. Wigg's Pamphlet.

O'KANE v. O'KANE AND VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.

THIS most disgraceful affair has come to a worthy termination. Shortly after the petition for dissolution of marriage was filed, in which the petitioner charged his wife with adultery, and the Prime Minister of the British empire, a married man living with his wife, and now in his eightieth year, as the partner in her crime, the petitioner claiming as damages the modest sum of 20,000*l.*, the lady filed an answer, denying that she ever was his wife, and also denying the adulterous acts. The co-respondent contented himself with obtaining an order of the Court for the particulars of the marriage, and of the times and places where the alleged acts of adultery were committed. Of this order the deeply injured husband took no notice for two months, and, at the expiration of that period, the respondent, by her counsel, Mr. W. Digby Seymour and Mr. Joyce, applied to the Court to take the petition off the file, and dismiss the suit, on the ground of non-compliance with that order. The sagacity of the judge, Sir J. P. Wilde, interposed with the observation that the identity in interest of the respondent and co-respondent could not be assumed; that as the respondent had no hand in obtaining the order, she had no right to complain of its not having been complied with; but he granted a rule, calling on the petitioner to shew cause why he should not proceed in the suit, or, in default of his so doing, why the petition should not be dismissed. This rule came on for argument on the 2nd February, when Mr. G. Browne appeared for the respondent, and the Queen's Advocate for the co-respondent. Some affidavits were produced, among which was one from the petitioner's attorney, which spoke of the cause as having been "compromised," and set out the following, under the circumstances, truly iniquitous letter, addressed to him by the petitioner:—

"47, Moorgate-street, City, Jan. 16, 1864.

"MYSELF v. PALMERSTON AND O'KANE.

"Dear Sir,—Yielding to the advice of my friends, I have decided to drop the above suit, and I hereby instruct you to stay all further proceedings. I adopt this course solely for the sake of my young children, and not from any inability to establish the allegations contained in my petition, or to prosecute the suit to a successful conclusion, as the letters which I submitted to you, and the evidence laid before you, offered prima facie every probability of success. On the letters and correspondence, fortified by the opinion of counsel, you undertook the suit by my instructions, and I feel perfectly satisfied with your professional conduct, as well as that of your managing clerk, Mr. Weston, who was not deterred from undertaking the just cause by the frantic howl of a venial and corrupt press—the cause of right against might. I beg you to give the most complete contradiction to the assertion made by some of the London and other papers, that I was in the employment of either of you, my own resources and those of my friends having enabled me to live independent of such aid. I was lawfully married to my wife, the respondent in this suit, by a Catholic priest, regularly ordained, and acting with full jurisdiction, and celebrating the marriage with all the rites and ecclesiastical formalities of the Catholic Church. This could have been satisfactorily proved had the case gone into court. As to the alleged acts of adultery, the correspondence and other evidence would leave no doubt had the case gone to a jury.

"I am, yours truly, (Signed) "T. J. O'KANE.

"Mr. Thomas Wells, Solicitor, 47, Moorgate-street, City."

The Queen's Advocate having asked for an adjournment, on the ground that he had not seen the affidavits, the case was adjourned till the 4th inst., when both the respondent and co-respondent denying that any compromise had been entered into by them, the petitioner's counsel explained that the arrangement spoken of was made between him and his friends, and withdrew the suit.

THE JUDGE ORDINARY then delivered judgment as follows:—"The suit must be dismissed. The petitioner came into court with his complaint, and he now retires from it without any imputation upon either of the other parties to the suit, and without any suggestion of an arrangement between himself and either of them, on grounds best known to himself, and in consequence of what he, by his counsel, calls an arrangement with his friends. It is, no doubt, much to be regretted that a man should be able to attack the character of a woman whom he calls his wife, and to hold her up to public censure without cause. Owing to the publicity which happily attends every step in our courts, that evil is unfortunately aggravated, but the remedy is to be found in the same publicity. The chastity of the respondent, who has in vain challenged inquiry into, and proof of, the charges against her, has received no tarnish from this ordeal; and, as for the petitioner, he retires from the suit with the evil words still on his lips, and will probably meet with the censure of some, and with the contempt of many. The Court cannot part with this suit without one word respecting the co-respondent. It is a matter of great satisfaction to the Court, that a man never mentioned in England without just pride should have passed from its annals without a stain."

Later in the day,

Mr. W. D. Seymour said he had omitted to ask for costs, and he understood that a formal order was necessary.

JUDGE ORDINARY.—Certainly. The man who has presented a petition to this Court, and has voluntarily abandoned it, ought to pay the costs. The petition is accordingly dismissed.

MR. CHARLES RANN KENNEDY AND THE SWINFEN CASE.

WE long believed that we had heard the last of Mr. Charles Rann Kennedy and the Swinfen case. This, however, turns out a mistake, Mr. Kennedy having appealed to the Lords Justices against the decision of the Master of the Rolls, which set aside the deed executed in his favour by Mrs. Broun (alias Swinfen). The best elucidation of the affair will be to let the document speak for itself:—

"This indenture, made the 10th May, 1859, between Patience Swinfen, of Swinfen Hall, in the county of Stafford, widow, of the one part, and Charles Rann Kennedy, of the Inner Temple, London, barrister, of the other part: whereas, the said Patience Swinfen has for a long time past been engaged in legal proceedings in and about the defending and establishing her title to the estate hereinafter mentioned, and the said legal proceedings have been brought to a final conclusion, and her title to the said estate is now fully established; and whereas the said Charles Rann Kennedy has been engaged as her counsel in the said legal proceedings, and she, the said Patience Swinfen, desires to recompense him for his services as such counsel, and to convey to him the reversion of the said estate, subject to her own life interest therein, and chargeable as hereinafter appears: now, this indenture witnesseth, that, in consideration of the services rendered to her as aforesaid by the said Charles Rann Kennedy, and also in consideration of her esteem and friendship for the said Charles Rann Kennedy, she, the said Patience Swinfen, doth hereby, of her own free will, give, grant, and convey unto the said Charles Rann Kennedy and his heirs, all that her estate at Swinfen, near Lichfield, in the said county of Stafford, comprising a mansion-house and grounds and several farms near or adjoining thereto, all which said estate was devised to her, the said Patience Swinfen, by Samuel Swinfen, of Swinfen Hall aforesaid, and all the lands, hereditaments, rights, liberties, easements, privileges, rents, and profits whatsoever to the said estate belonging, or in anywise appertaining, or with the same now, or at any time hereintofore, demised, held, occupied, or enjoyed, or reputed, deemed, taken, or known as part or parcel thereof, with their appurtenances, and all the estate, right, title, interest, property, claim, and demand, both at law and in equity, of her, the said Patience Swinfen, in, to, or upon the said premises, and every part thereof, to have and to hold the said estate, mansion-house, grounds, farms, land, hereditaments, and all and singular other the premises hereby given, granted, and conveyed, or expressed and intended so to be, unto the said Charles Rann Kennedy and his heirs, to the use of the said Patience Swinfen for the term of her natural life; and from and after the decease of the said Patience Swinfen, to the use of the said Charles Rann Kennedy, his heirs and assigns, subject to, and chargeable with, all such debts as shall be due and owing from the said Patience Swinfen at the time of her decease, not exceeding in the whole the sum of 10,000*l.*, and also subject to be chargeable with the payment of such sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of 10,000*l.*, to such person or persons respectively as the said Patience Swinfen shall by her last will direct and appoint. In witness whereof the said parties hereto have set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written."

Mr. Kennedy admitted that the deed was drawn by himself, and it was attested by two attorneys at Birmingham, Messrs. Collis & Ure.

The appeal was heard on the 29th January, when Mr. Kennedy appeared in support of his own case.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE, in giving judgment, said—"The only question now before us, besides the costs of the suit, is, whether we should allow the deed to stand, or to set it aside, with consequential directions. The contents of the deed are alone sufficient to condemn it, on the assumption that the recitals contained in it are true; but, with respect to their truth, the defendant, who drew the instrument, cannot certainly complain. It is, however, not perhaps impossible to suppose the existence of circumstances, in point of fact, sufficient to support the deed in the defendant's favour. Are there, however, such circumstances in evidence before the Court? In my opinion, there are not. The deed was either a mere gift, or was executed in pursuance of a contract. As a gift, of course, it cannot be sustained between a client, whether man or woman, and the counsel of that client, who had been so recently engaged in professional and legal matters, such as have been mentioned, for recovering for his client the real estate itself, of which so valuable a portion formed the subject of the gift. Then, as to the question, whether it was in pursuance of a contract; the draft of the deed was drawn by the defendant himself, and there was no professional person consulted on behalf of the lady before she executed it, except Messrs. Collis & Ure, of Birmingham, her solicitors, in whose office, and under whose directions, the deed was executed on the 10th May. They saw her, and spoke to her, before her execution of it on that day. I am of opinion that, apart from all considerations of public policy, the lady had and has a right to complain, seriously and effectually, that she laboured under that want of sufficient advice, information, and assistance on the subject, before and when she executed the deed, which in my judgment was, and is, an instrument of great, substantial, and manifest impropriety, and from which the lady who executed it, however clever she may be, and probably is, has a plain right to be delivered, and against which relief could not be refused, without manifest discredit to the administration of justice."

Lord Justice TURNER concurring, the appeal was dismissed, with costs. (See the report at length in 10 Jur., part 1, p. 142.)

With the conduct of Mrs. Broun throughout this affair we have nothing to do. Whatever may be thought on that subject, it is most painful to see a gentleman of Mr. Kennedy's great learning and abilities in a position so thoroughly degrading. We hope, however, that it is not yet too late for him to retrieve his character and position at the bar; and trust that, in any event, the Swingen case and the incidents accompanying it will prove a salutary warning to others.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 20, 1864.

THE Juridical Society, at its meeting last Monday, with a report of which we have been favoured, entered upon the important question of the aberration of intellect as an excuse for crime. A paper was read on that occasion by Mr. J. W. Hume Williams, who, though now at the bar, was formerly connected with the medical profession, intitled "The legal notion of unsound mind constituting irresponsibility for crime, as exemplified in the case of George Victor Townley." Dr. Forbes Winslow, who appeared as witness on the part of Townley at the trial, and whose peculiar views on this subject are so well known, presided, and addressed the meeting at considerable length. A debate ensued, in which Mr. Neate, M.P., Mr. Worsley, Mr. C. Hopwood, and Mr. Ratcliffe (another medical gentleman), took part, and it stands adjourned until Monday, the 29th instant.

Although Townley's name appears in the title of the paper, his case becomes of little importance compared with the great principle discussed on Monday evening—namely, whether the existing law on the subject of irresponsibility for crime is in a sound, or at least, in a perfect state. The foundation of it rests mainly on the answers given by the judges to the House of Lords to certain questions put to them, arising out of the case of Daniel M'Naghten (10 Cl. & Fin. 200, 210). In that case, Tindal, C.J., in the name of all the judges, except Maule, J., who delivered his own opinion, says, "To establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved, that at the time of the committing of the act the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong. . . . If the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if that act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable." Dr. Winslow, Mr. J. W. Hume Williams, and those who think with them, contend that this should be altered; that delusion is not the true test of insanity; and the former laid down, in a written document, which he delivered to the meeting, that instead of the question usually put to juries in such cases, the following should be substituted:—

"Was the prisoner insane when he committed the crime, such insanity being the effect of a disorder of the brain, and was he, in consequence of this mental and physical condition, incapable at the time of exercising a healthy control over his thoughts and actions."

In support of his views, Dr. Winslow urged that there is a conflict between legal and medical views on the subject of insanity; arising from this, that the persons who propound their views to juries know nothing personally of practical investigations of insanity.

There can, he said, be no insanity without some disorder of the brain, either directly or sympathetically. In many cases of unmistakable insanity, on a superficial examination of the brain, no appreciable change of structure can be detected. But where the mind is clearly diseased, there must be some alteration of the tissue of the brain or its membranes, whether it can be detected by the senses or by the microscope. There is a thing called "brain matter," which partly consists of phosphorus. In idiots the quantity of this latter is very small. It is, he contended, the want of power over the WILL which constitutes the essence of derangement.

We take leave to observe, that if this is not a legal question, neither is it a medical one; it is a meta-physical question, involving considerations of the gravest character. Dr. Winslow, however, made two statements, which appear to us rather at variance with his theory. First, that lunatics have been found, who, after shewing that they knew perfectly the nature of murder, and the penalty affixed to it by law, added—"I should not be hanged for murder, because I am a lunatic"—an answer which speaks for itself; and, secondly, in reply to a question put by Mr. Worsley, that the minds even of undoubted lunatics are capable of being acted on by the dread of punishment.

In the course of his paper Mr. J. W. Hume Williams referred to the laws of other countries on this subject, as being more liberal to the accused than our own. The Scotch law, "If, though somewhat deranged, he" (the accused) "is yet able to distinguish right from wrong, in his own case, and to know that he was doing wrong in the act which he committed, he is liable to the full punishment of his criminal acts." (Alison's Prin. Cr. Law of Scotland, 645, 654). This is, substantially, our own law. The Code Napoléon (Code Pénal, § 64); "There is neither felony nor misdemeanour" (we see no better way of translating 'crime' and délit) "when the accused was in a state of alienation of mind" (so Mr. J. W. Hume Williams translated démence) "at the time of the act;" ("Il n'y a ni crime ni délit, lorsque le prévenu était en état de démence au temps de l'action")—a definition that gives no information whatever, unless we are to understand "démence" as including every case where there is the slightest aberration of intellect. Mr. Ratcliffe stated, that according to the practice of the French tribunals, whenever insanity in an accused person is suspected, a commission of medical men is appointed to examine him, who make a joint report, which is afterwards produced at the trial, when they are subject to examination and cross-examination on the subject. In order to estimate truly the value of this plan, we should know by whom the medical commissioners are chosen, whether there is a right of challenging them, and some other particulars.

The Juridical Society has done good service, by instituting a formal discussion on this important question, where Dr. Winslow and his friends may fairly encounter those (and such are the vast majority of the bench and bar) who differ from them. For our own part, while we deem the views of those gentlemen respecting moral insanity, irresistible impulse to crime, &c., absurd in themselves, and if carried out, dangerous to the peace and security of the community, still it is very possible that the law is imperfectly expressed, and too tight in the opposite direction. We cannot admit that insanity and the presence of delusion are convertible terms; at least, if "delusion" is understood in its ordinary sense; seeing that most men labour under delusions of some kind, often of many kinds. On the other hand, delusion, though the usual concomitant of insanity, may not be indispensable to its existence.

Nor should the decision of judges, however learned, or the opinion of medical men, however eminent, deter us from looking this question straight in the face. Some author, whose name we have forgotten, says, "In reading what our old lawyers have written on the subject of insanity, we should remember that their notions of it were formed on observation of those wretched inmates of the madhouse, whom stripes and chains, cold and filth, had degraded to the stupidity of an idiot, or exasperated to the fury of a demon." All this has been happily removed, and the kind treatment of the insane of our days is one of the real blessings of an improved medical science. Still, while the errors of our forefathers shew us the danger of dogmatising on this subject, and while we treat the insane with all due consideration for their unhappy condition, we must not, in obedience to blind theories in the opposite direction, or even, under the imposing name of humanity, deliver society over helpless to the violence of real or pretended lunatics.

LAW REPORTING.

WE have received from Mr. Darby a copy of a letter addressed by him to Mr. Hopwood, the secretary of the Committee appointed to consider the subject of Law Reporting, and insert it for the consideration of our readers:—

6, Old-square, Lincoln's-inn,
Feb. 12, 1864.

Sir,—In reply to the invitation of the Committee on Law Reporting to make any observations or suggestions with reference to that subject, I have the honour to request that you will be good enough to lay before them the following observations:—

It seems to me, that, in considering the merits of the existing system, or of any proposed system, of reporting, the following principles should always be borne in mind:—

First, that reporting ought not to be a department of the State, because to allow persons nominees of, and responsible to, the Crown or Parliament, to be the sole and authoritative recorders of the law as laid down by the judges, who are themselves responsible for such law to neither, would infringe on the independence and functions of the judges, as well as on the independence and privileges of the Bar.

Secondly, reporting ought not to be the duty of the judges, or under their absolute control, because it would entail upon them labour which they could not have time properly to perform, and it would necessarily tend, as pointed out by Mr. Denman at the meeting in Lincoln's-inn Hall, to make them less accurate in delivering their judgments.

Thirdly, that no authorised body of men ought to be intrusted with the duty of making reports, to be the only reports allowed to be cited; because (whether it be right or wrong that one set of reports should be preferred to another, if a case is reported in more than one report) every case the moment it is decided is a precedent, and at once becomes public property as such, and every suitor has a right to have it quoted in his favour, and it is both the duty and the right of counsel to cite it in the interests of his client. And this would practically become impossible as to any case not reported by such authorised body.

Fourthly, that no commission, or any body of men, whether judges, barristers, or both, ought to be appointed to make an authoritative revision and expurgation of the reports; because that would amount to decisions of the Courts being reversed or confirmed, without a Court, without counsel, and without suitors.

The reasons upon which the foregoing principles are founded appear to me so cogent, that, if altering the present system would involve any of them being contravened, it would seem better that such system, whatever its faults may be, should remain as it is.

I would further suggest, that mistakes in the reports of judgments must necessarily be unavoidable, and absolute accuracy in them impossible, owing to the judges delivering so many, and frequently very important ones, unwritten (a state of things which must always exist, for if the judges delivered all their judgments written, they could not get through the judicial business of the public); and I would ask the Committee to consider whether experience has not proved that the existence of several independent reports is an efficient practical remedy for this evil, and whether, therefore, on this ground, there would not be a grave objection to any system which would entail the exclusive use of any one set of reports.

And I would, in conclusion, draw the attention of the Committee to this—that what appears to be the gravamen of the charge against the present system of reporting, namely, that the number of cases reported is so great, and increasing yearly at an enormous ratio, seems to arise, not so much from any fault in the system itself, as from causes which it is impossible to control, namely, the increase of population and wealth, the increase of capital embarked in commercial speculation, modern discoveries, and the highly artificial state of society and of the relations between man and man. For the effect of all this is, not only so to increase the number of cases brought under the cognisance of the Courts as to have rendered necessary additional courts, but even to be continually bringing into existence new subject-matter of, and new points for, litigation. This evil, therefore, though capable of mitigation by means of digests, indexes, and text-books, as affording facilities for reference, seems to be one which no one can hope to remedy.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. GEORGE N. DARBY.

BELLIGERENTS AND NEUTRALS.

THE following is the substance of the paper read at the meeting of the Juridical Society, on the 1st inst., by Mr. C. Clark, on "the Principles that ought mutually to govern the Conduct of Neutrals and Belligerents:"—

Mr. Clark, at the outset, sought to shew that modern practices between neutrals and belligerents are, to a great extent, at variance with the principles deducible from their mutual relations, and that, moreover, those practices are inconsistent with each other. Rendering willing homage to the ability and courage that have presided in prize courts, he entertained no doubt, however, that fear for the safety of their country, and kindred feelings, had from time to time, perhaps unconsciously, affected the decisions of the judges, or at least influenced their accompanying remarks, which had been treated as the rules of jurisprudence. Hence the first principle which, above all others, ought to be brought to bear upon the subject was that of good faith; and he could not say that the present war in America had so far materially tended towards ascertaining the rights as between neutrals and belligerents. In his view, according to correct principles, the placing not of a seaport, but of a whole coast, under blockade, was unlawful; so also was the searching of all vessels on the high seas; and, lastly, the capturing of vessels when not carrying contraband of war was unlawful. These assumed rights he controverted with much minuteness, affirming that the first had been assumed as belonging of right to a belligerent only as a State necessity; that the second had been suggested by the convenience of belligerents; and the third was of no authority whatever. Fortifying this last position by the judgments of Sir William Scott, and arguing that there might be a change of intention on the part of the master of a neutral trader, while in transit, as to his destination, he urged that the rule assumed a wrong which was not done—a thing not assumed by any other law, and should not be permitted in maritime law alone. To try the principle, he supposed a case—namely, that but one country could produce the medicine known as bark. If that country were to be at war, was all the rest of the world to be liable to fever without relief in the meantime? Belligerents breaking the peace, for their own reasons, could not suppose that other nations would submit to anything beyond the inevitable necessities arising out of the conflict. Shewing that modern belligerent practices were innovations upon principles at one time accepted, he instanced a treaty concluded in 1674 between Great Britain and the United Provinces, providing for entire freedom of trade in time of war, except in the case of contraband goods; and quoted a decision founded thereon by the House of Lords in 1783; and, further, he instanced a similar treaty made by this country with France; and these instances he took to indicate that the principle of freedom of trade in time of war, excepting only contraband, was accepted and approved. It had never been allowed, he went on to urge, that a belligerent was entitled to injure the trading of a neutral nation. The assumption had been obliquely insinuated, but it had never been openly avowed. But the practice now set up was to destroy the commerce of a neutral as well as that of the enemy. Such was done at the present time by the existing blockade in America. The trade of Europe and of the Southern States had been taken as identical. But no such right existed. Excepting in articles contraband of war, Europe had a right to have its trade as before. It might be said, that such had not been the practice, but that was because principles had been abandoned, and improper practices allowed to be adopted. Treaties, therefore, which had been founded on practices, instead of taking principles as the correctives of practices, had not taken the test by which they should have been guided. One practice introduced he regarded as essentially piratical—the practice recently put into operation by a person claiming a commission from his Government to seize and burn unarmed vessels. The first act of the kind occasioned a thrill of astonishment, if not of horror, in the public mind. It was said, that necessity justified it. But never was a more superficial view taken of any important matter. The supposed necessity arose from the fact, that as the Government which commissioned the capture had no ports of its own to which the captured vessel might be taken, and no courts in which legal proceedings could be instituted, the capture must be made after the manner pursued. This was the reason taken by Paul Jones, who, however, carried it a little further, and, because he had no prison for his captives, made them walk the plank. The fancied reason was utterly worthless. No nation, more than any man, had a right to put itself into any condition, without taking all the consequences that legitimately follow. If a nation had no ports nor courts where prizes might be adjudged, it must abandon the ships which it takes as prizes, because in all countries an adjudication is necessary before the right of the captor can be established. The conclusions at which he had arrived he finally stated to be, that the blockade of a whole coast is unjustifiable; that the blockade ought to be confined to a besieged port or other place; that at all other times neutrals have a right to carry on trade with the enemy in all matters not concerned in war; that no stoppage should be allowed on the high seas, except within the defined limits of the blockade; and that then, as a balance on the side of the belligerent, all trade in articles of war ought to be prohibited by neutrals to their subjects. To these he would add, the adoption of the principles suggested by Mr. Jefferson Davis, that instead of nations adjudicating their prizes in their own courts, they should be allowed to carry them for adjudication into the courts of neutrals.

REVIEW.

The Practice of the Court of Chancery; with Forms of Costs, and other Forms; Acts concerning Trustees, Charitable Trusts, Settled Estates, and Infants' Marriage Settlements, &c. The Third Edition. By HENRY JARMAN, a Solicitor of the Court.

[W. Maxwell; H. Sweet; Stevens, Sons, & Haynes. 1864.]

THE utility of Mr. Jarman's book on Chancery Practice is shewn by the Profession requiring a third edition.

It is not, indeed, a work likely to be so useful to members of the Bar as Mr. Morgan's work on the Chancery Acts and Orders; nor does the author profess to deal with pleading, as was so well done in the earlier editions of Daniel's Chancery Practice; nor is it so full in some respects as Mr. Sidney Smith's useful work on Chancery Practice; but it forms an excellent manual for solicitors and managing clerks, to guide them through the intricacies of a Chancery suit.

Since the last edition of the work was published, many changes have taken place in the practice of the Court of Chancery; and whether they have been effected by statutes, orders, or regulations, they have been carefully incorporated in the present edition, together with the decisions of the Courts, which have been well classified and noticed under their proper heads.

The arrangement of the book is convenient to the practitioner, for, as the proceedings in a suit by a plaintiff and defendant respectively have been placed in the order in which it is probable that they may occur, and each course of practice has been kept distinct from the other, he is enabled almost at one view to see before him the several steps he may be called upon to adopt in the progress of a suit, in the order in which they may occur.

The value of the book is also much increased by a copious and well-constructed index.

Tudor's Leading Cases on Real Property, Conveyancing, and the Construction of Wills and Deeds, with Notes. Second Edition. [Butterworths. 1863.]

THIS well-known work needs no commendation. Justice to Mr. Tudor, however, requires us to say, that familiarity with its pages from its first appearance have convinced us of its value, not only as a repertory of cases, but a judicious summary of the law upon the subjects it treats of. "In this edition," the author tells us, "the notes have been carefully revised, and much new matter has been added, whenever the subject appeared to the author to require further explanation or expansion;" and we accordingly observe, that he has carefully elaborated various portions of the book, which we had thought admitted of more detailed treatment, and of fuller statements of the bearing of the cases referred to. A new leading case (Lord Braybroke v. Inskip), with notes on the subject of devises of mortgage and trust estates, has, it appears, been added to this edition. The author's statement, that "the number of cases cited has been largely increased," is fully borne out by a comparison of the two editions, and, we may add, "usefully increased." So far as we can see, the author has brought down the cases to the latest period; and altogether there have been added about 170 pages of notes in the present edition. As a guide to the present law, the book will now be of great value to the lawyer; and it will be especially useful to him, when away from a large library, as a convenient and reliable substitute.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, Feb. 12.

Earl Grenville moved the appointment of a committee of the Lords to act together with the committee of the House of Commons on Metropolitan Railways.

Agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday, Feb. 12.

Mr. M. Smith asked the First Commissioner of Works whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce in the present session any measure for building new courts of justice in the metropolis, or for improving the state of the existing courts.

Mr. Cowper said it was the intention of Government to introduce a bill for the concentration of the courts of law and equity on a site to be purchased between Carey-street and the Strand, in accordance with the recommendation of the royal commission which had reported on the subject.

Monday, Feb. 15.

Mr. Black asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government intended to bring in a bill this session for consolidating the acts relating to copyright in works of literature and art.

Mr. M. Gibson said the Government had no present intention of bringing in a bill to consolidate those acts. Circumstances had not arisen to render such a measure of urgent necessity.

Mr. Black was understood to give notice that he would himself bring in a bill.

Sir G. Grey (the Home Secretary) moved the second reading of the Insane Prisoners' Act Amendment Bill.

Mr. Hardy thought it essential that the verdict should be conclusive as to the state of mind of the prisoner up to the time it was given, and that all subsequent inquiry should relate solely to his state of mind after the verdict. He would, therefore, suggest to the right hon. baronet, without meaning to oppose the second reading, to leave the bill as it stood with regard to cases of imprisonment or penal servitude, but in the case of capital punishment the bill should be altered to this effect. The words of the bill were, "If any prisoner should appear to be insane." It did not appear from the bill to whom or in what way the prisoner was to appear insane. His suggestion was, "If it shall appear to the visiting justices that a prisoner is insane, they should represent it to the Secretary of State." And it seemed to him that the Secretary of State ought then to issue some commission, whose proceedings, if not public, should at all events be published, and that their judgment should be binding upon the Secretary of State, in the statutory capacity they were giving him, without interfering with the prerogative of her Majesty. With reference to the strange contrariety of medical opinions at the various investigations, the hon. and learned member urged the necessity of introducing into the commission which would be created, if his suggestion were adopted, a portion of the lay element—but, of course, medical men could be called in and consulted.

Mr. Macdonogh said, in his opinion the Secretary of State was wrong in devising a remedy to an enacting statute. It was clear to him that a declaratory statute of ten lines would be much more effective. The bill was framed upon a mistaken view of the construction of the words "it shall be lawful," in the act of the 3 & 4 Vict. The right hon. baronet seemed to regard them as absolutely imperative, obligatory, and mandatory; whereas the words were clearly permissive, and all that was wanted was a declaration to that effect:—"Whereas doubts have arisen, and still exist, as to whether the words 'it shall be lawful' are mandatory or permissive, be it enacted that those words shall be held to be discretionary;" leaving it to the Secretary of State to satisfy himself by reasonable inquiry that the prisoner was insane.

Sir C. O'Loughlin was prepared to adopt the bill, but at the same time he should have preferred that it made it obligatory upon the Secretary of State, instead of leaving it discretionary with him, to order a public investigation into the alleged lunacy. He regretted, however, that the bill was not extended to Ireland and Scotland.

Mr. Scourfield was most anxious, that in the determination of these questions the legal element should not be made subordinate to the medical element; the reasoning of the lawyer was directed to the good of society at large, while the physician bustled himself simply about the condition of the patient, and his chances of recovery.

Mr. D. Seymour pointed out that the bill contained no provision meeting the case of a prisoner under sentence of death who was declared insane, but who subsequently recovered. Provision was made for the case of a man sentenced to a term of imprisonment, or to transportation, but none for such a case as Townley's.

Mr. Hunt hoped that a distinction would be made between prisoners sentenced for minor offences and those under sentence of death or transportation. He also concurred in the opinion, that once the issue of insanity had been fairly raised before a jury and determined, the verdict ought not to be overridden by the certificate of visiting justices. If it should be questioned, it ought to be before a tribunal equally solemn and responsible.

Lord Enfield, omitting altogether the legal aspect of the question, thought that some power of safeguard should be given to the visiting justices, who would then be glad to take upon themselves the responsibility, which, if they had not that safeguard, many would shirk.

Mr. M. Smith said, he had looked at that bill, and had come to the same conclusion as the member for Leominster had done, and thought that the Home Secretary would be left in the same position as before, except that the act had given him a power of discretion which before was doubtful, as to whether he had or had not to act upon the opinion of justices. But would it, he asked, be satisfactory to a jury whose verdict had been given upon the very point in question, if that verdict were reversed three days after by a certificate given by three justices and two medical men? Therefore he thought that something more solemn, something more open, something the public could understand, should be done, before this sentence was reversed. His suggestion would be to take the old constitutional tribunal of a jury. They were the best tribunal to decide on conflicting evidence, and to determine whether the medical evidence or that of the other evidence was right. He believed they would decide rightly, and he was quite sure of this, that no other tribunal would give such satisfaction to the country.

Mr. Evans said, he agreed with the visiting justices of Derby, that an entirely different system should be pursued in trying the insanity of prisoners, and thought it would be very desirable, indeed, that some tribunal, concerning the competency of which there could be no doubt whatever, and the proceedings of which should be entirely public, should be constituted for the purpose of determining that question.

Sir G. Bowyer said, his idea was, that the medical men did not act as judges in cases of this description, but might be called before any legal tribunal as experts, and give their opinion on the subject in answer to questions. The medical idea of insanity had for its object the existence of mental disease, and was perfectly different from the legal idea of insanity, which was grounded on the responsibility of a person, or his capacity to do certain acts; and the effect of this diversity was, that, in their ideas of insanity, medical and legal men would be to a considerable extent at cross purposes. The best suggestion that had been made was, that the question of the sanity of the prisoner after conviction should be tried by a jury. But whether tried by a jury or by commissioners, whether the question was the sanity of the prisoner before or after conviction—he was of opinion that medical men should only appear as “experts” before that commission or jury, and not as judges of the question, whether the prisoner was to be executed or not. It might be worth while for the Crown to name certain eminent physicians, who should give their opinions in all cases of that nature, being adequately remunerated; for without some such arrangement the public would never be satisfied with the decision come to on such momentous questions.

Mr. F. Goldmid was of opinion that the proposed inquiry into the state of mind of a prisoner should be confined to cases of insanity alleged to have supervened after the conviction; and that it should be taken for granted, if insanity had occurred between the commission of the crime and the trial, the jury had rightly decided the question. This would prevent the collision that would otherwise arise between such a tribunal and the judge and jury—a state of things which was much to be deprecated.

Sir W. Jolliffe said, he would urge on the right hon. baronet to give that circumstance his consideration, and endeavour to frame his bill on some system by which it might be made applicable where insanity had supervened on a capital conviction.

Sir F. Kelly was strongly of opinion, that the jurisdiction of magistrates and physicians should have been limited to ordinary offences, and that capital crimes should have been excluded from the operation of the act. He was preparing a bill, which he hoped would be before the House before this bill went into committee, which, instead of leaving the power in the hands of a Secretary of State, of dealing with cases of this kind, would provide for their being investigated by a constitutional tribunal, such as a judge and jury. If the time arrived when they could entirely abolish capital punishment, and impose upon the worst of criminals the next severest punishment which the law could inflict, with a certainty of its being an effective condemnation for life, these unseemly questions would cease to arise.

Mr. M'Mahon said, that all such cases as this they were discussing were provided for by the New York Code, which required cases of lunacy, occurring after conviction, to be tried by a judge and jury.

Mr. Alderman Rose remarked, that during this celebrated case there had been another case of murder, which had attracted considerable attention. The proceedings connected with the trial and execution of Wright had given some rise to the impression, that there was one law for the rich, and another for the poor. There could be little doubt, that if Wright had money, and was instructed to plead not guilty, he might have escaped the capital sentence.

Sir George Grey replied, and the bill was read a second time.

Mr. Paull obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the discharge of insolvent debtors in certain cases.

Mr. C. Forster obtained leave to bring in a bill to abolish the forfeiture of lands and goods on conviction of felony.

Tuesday, Feb. 16.

Mr. M. Gibson obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate, in certain cases, the obtaining of further powers by railway companies.

Mr. Dodson moved the nomination of the select committee on the registration of county voters; which was agreed to.

Mr. Hunt moved, that it be an instruction to such committee, that they have power to inquire into the sufficiency of the powers vested in revising barristers for enforcing order in their courts, and to report on the same.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 27, 1864.

IMPORTANT questions often arise upon the severance of an heritage by the owner into two or more parts, as to whether a grant or reservation of easements can be implied.

It has, however, been long since settled, that upon a severance, all those easements without which the enjoyment of the severed portion could not be had will be implied. Thus, if A. sells a field which is entirely surrounded by land of his own, although the deed by which he conveys the field contains no express grant of a right of way through the land which he retains, a grant will be implied as being necessary to the enjoyment of the field. Such way is termed a way of necessity. And if A. afterwards sold the land surrounding the field, without noticing the right of way, the grantee nevertheless takes subject to it, for not only cannot the grantor derogate from his implied grant of a right of way, but the grantee of the surrounding fields takes subject to it.

In like manner, if A. had retained the field, selling the whole of the surrounding land, but not expressly reserving any right of way through them, the law nevertheless would imply a reservation of right of way as necessary to the enjoyment of the field.

Where, moreover, a natural watercourse runs through a heritage which is afterwards severed by the sale of part, the grantee, although there may have been no reservation on the part of the grantor, has no right to obstruct the flow of water. This was clearly decided in Sury v. Pigot (Poph. 166), which case, however, proceeds upon the principle, that no riparian proprietor has a right to interfere with the natural flow of water to the injury of other riparian proprietors, and does not depend upon the notion of the watercourse being an easement.

In what cases there will be an implied grant or reservation of easements on a severance of a heritage when they are not easements of necessity, is at present by no means clear. Until lately, at all events, it was generally understood, that where the owner of two tenements sold one of them, there would be an implied grant of those continuous and apparent easements, which, during the unity of possession, were enjoyed under the title of ownership. Where, for instance, a person possesses a house, having the actual use and enjoyment of certain lights, and also possesses the adjoining land, and sells the house to another person, although the lights be new, he cannot, nor can any person who claims under him, build upon the adjoining land so as to obstruct or interrupt the enjoyment of those lights.

And it seems that the result would be the same if the owner had sold the land and retained the house, as in such case there would be an implied reservation to himself of the continuous and apparent easement of lights which the purchaser of the land would not be able to obstruct. (Riviere v. Bower, 1 Ry. & M. 24; and see Swansborough v. Coventry, 9 Bing. 305).

We have before seen that unity of possession, in no manner affects the right of subsequent riparian proprietors in the case of a natural watercourse, is the law different when the watercourse is artificial, as in the case of a pipe or drain?

In Sury v. Pigot, it seems to be assumed, by Whitlocke, C. J., that a gutter or pipe would not be extinguished by unity of possession, if left untouched by the proprietor during such unity of possession. (The Lady Brown's case, Palm. 446).

This was most distinctly laid down in the Court of Exchequer in the case of Pyer v. Carter (1 H. & Norm. 916). There, the plaintiff's and defendant's houses adjoined each other. They had formerly been one house, and were converted into two by the owner of the whole property. Subsequently the defendant's house was conveyed to him, and afterwards the plaintiff took a conveyance of his house. At the times of these conveyances, a drain ran under the plaintiff's house, and thence under the defendant's, and discharged itself into the common sewer. Water from the eaves of the defendant's house fell on the plaintiff's house, and then ran into a drain on the plaintiff's premises, and thence through the drain into the common sewer. The plaintiff's house was drained through this sewer. It was held by the Court of Exchequer, that the plaintiff was, by implied grant (or, more correctly speaking, by implied reservation), entitled to have the use of the drain, because it was used at the time of the defendant's purchase of his house. And Watson, B., observed, "We think it was the defendant's own fault, that he did not ascertain what easements the owner of the adjoining house exercised at the time of the purchase." The case of Pyer v. Carter appears to have been cited with approbation by the House of Lords in Ewart v. Cochrane (7 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 925); and in Polden v. Bastard (11 Weekly Rep., Q. B., 778), by the Court of Queen's Bench.

It is true, that where the easement is not continuous or apparent, as in the case of the right to use a pump (Polden v. Bastard, 11 Weekly Rep., Q. B., 778), or a right of way (Pheysey v. Vicary, 16 M. & W. 484), a grant or reservation of it will not be implied upon the severance of the unity of possession. (See also Worthington v. Gimson, 6 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1053; and Daniel v. Anderson, 8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 328).

In the recent case of Suffield v. Brown (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 111), the subject of implied grants and reservations of easements was most elaborately discussed by the Lord Chancellor; and although it was not actually necessary to the decision of the case before him, he, in the clearest manner, dissented from the principles laid down by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Pyer v. Carter, and reversed the decision of Sir J. Romilly, M. R., who followed that case, as being the decision of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. In Suffield v. Brown it appeared, that from the year 1841 till the year 1845, the same person was the owner and occupier both of a dock and of a strip of land and wharf adjoining the dock; and during that period, whenever a vessel of considerable size was taken into the dock to be repaired, her standing bowsprit projected over and across the adjoining strip of land. In 1845, the strip of land and wharf were sold to a person through whom the defendants claimed, without any easement being reserved by the grantor. In 1846 the dock was sold to the plaintiff; the bowsprits of the vessels in the dock had, from the year 1845, continued to project over the wharf. Upon a bill being filed by the owner of the dock, to restrain the defendants from building upon the wharf in such a way as to prevent the bowsprits overhanging the wharf, Sir J. Romilly, M. R., granted the injunction (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 999), which was afterwards dissolved by the Lord Chancellor.

Now, we cannot but think that his Honor's decision was erroneous, because the right of having the bowsprits to project over the wharf was not a continuous or apparent easement, nor was it an easement of necessity, because the dock might have been enjoyed, though perhaps not so conveniently or so extensively, without its existence; and therefore the decision of his Honor might well have been reversed, in accordance with all the authorities, which clearly and indisputably lay down the principle, that there will be no implied grant or reservation of easements, except easements of necessity, unless they are continuous and apparent. The Lord Chancellor, however, did not confine himself to reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls on these grounds, but on the ground that the case of Pyer v. Carter, upon which the Master of the Rolls (though it appears to us not to be a case in point) principally relied, was erroneously decided.

With reference to Pyer v. Carter, the Lord Chancellor notices what he terms the "fallacy" in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer. "The expression of the Court," said his Lordship, "that the purchaser of the first house took it 'such as it is,' is erroneous, and shews a mistaken view of the matter; for in a question, as that was, between the purchaser and the subsequent grantee of his vendor, the purchaser takes the house, not 'such as it is,' but such as it is described and sold, and conveyed to him in and by his deed of conveyance; and the terms of conveyance in Pyer v. Carter were quite inconsistent with the notion of any right or interest remaining in the vendor. It was said by the Court that the easement was 'apparent,' because the purchaser might have found it out by inquiry; but the previous question is, whether he was under any obligation to make inquiry, or would be effected by the result of it? which, having regard to his contract and conveyance, he certainly was not. Under the circumstances of the case of Pyer v. Carter, the true conclusion was, that, as between the purchaser and the vendor, the former had a right to stop and block up the drain where it entered his premises; and that he had the same right against the vendor's grantee. I cannot look upon the case as rightly decided, and must wholly refuse to accept it as any authority."

The observations which the Lord Chancellor makes with regard to the danger which would result, if the doctrines laid down by the Master of the Rolls were carried out, viz. that a purchaser is in all cases bound to take notice of the mode in which the adjoining property is used by the vendor, are no doubt, so far as they are applicable to easements which are neither of necessity nor continuous and apparent, sound and conclusive. And the case which he puts of a manufacturer, who has been in the habit of throwing the refuse of his manufactory upon a strip of land which he afterwards sells, is a good illustration of the evil which would result, if the vendor or his representatives would be able, under an implied reservation, to claim the easement of continuing to throw out the refuse upon the strip of ground sold for the purpose of its being converted into a garden. That illustration, however, although very apt, as applied to the case of Suffield v. Brown, has no application to Pyer v. Carter, where the easement claimed was (in this respect differing from Suffield v. Brown) continuous and apparent.

Whether the evils which the Lord Chancellor seems to think would result from following Pyer v. Carter, would be as great as those which its reversal would occasion, admits, perhaps, of doubt.

Suppose a builder sells, one after another, a range of houses, built upon a uniform plan, having a drain running under the whole of the houses, by which the whole block is drained, or having a pipe into which the rain-water on the roof runs, in the absence of any express contract or reservation, is not the doctrine that each purchaser should take his house "as it is," at least, as convenient as that which would give him power to block up the drain, or cut the pipe? The doctrine laid down by the Lord Chancellor appears, however, to be in accordance with the Roman law. (Dig. lib. 8, tit. 2, l. 30). "Si quis ædes, quæ suis ædibus servirent, cum emisset, traditas sibi accepit, confusa sublataque servitus est: et, si rursus vendere vult, nominatim imponenda servitus est; aliquin libere veniunt." Nevertheless, the authorities of the English law, in the case of continuous and apparent easements, until the recent decision of the Lord Chancellor, differ from the Roman law, as laid down in the sentence above quoted from the Digest; nor do we think it by any means clear, that the law, as laid down in Pyer v. Carter, will necessarily, if brought in question before the highest tribunal, meet with universal disapprobation.

THE Merchandise Marks Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 88), many of the provisions of which did not come into operation until the 1st January, 1864, seems a statute likely to create a considerable amount of litigation, especially as it has been passed in times in which the frauds of trade are a constant subject of complaint, and contains numerous provisions intended to prevent these frauds. The act is remarkable for its verbiage; it may have been necessary to use such a multiplicity of words in order to reach the frauds of traders, but it certainly requires an unusual amount of patient attention, in order to grapple with, and comprehend the meaning of, the protracted sentences which are to be found in many of the sections. The definition of the term "trademark" in sect. 1, is almost enough to deter one from further consideration of the statute. "The word 'mark' shall include any name, signature, word, letter, device, emblem, figure, sign, seal, stamp, diagram, label, ticket, or other mark of any description; and the expression, 'trademark,' shall include any and every such name, signature, &c. lawfully used by any person to denote any chattel, or (in Scotland) any article of trade, manufacture, or merchandise, to be an article or thing of the manufacture, workmanship, production, or merchandise of such person, or to be an article or thing of any peculiar or particular description made or sold by such person; and shall also include any name, signature, word, letter, number, figure, mark, or sign which, in pursuance of any statute or statutes for the time being in force relating to registered designs, is to be put or placed upon, or attached to, any chattel or article during the existence or continuance of any copyright, or other sole right acquired under the provisions of such statutes, or any of them."

This is a tolerably long definition of the meaning of the word "trademark," and having thoroughly mastered it, the reader may perhaps be better able to conquer the succeeding sections. At present we will only speak of the 19th and 20th sections. The 19th section runs thus—"In every case in which, at any time after the 31st December, 1863, any person shall sell, or contract to sell (whether by writing or not), to any other person any chattel or article with any trademark thereon, or on any cask, bottle, stopper, vessel, case, cover, wrapper, band, reel, ticket, label, or other thing, together with which such chattel or article shall be sold, or contracted to be sold, the sale, or contract to sell, shall in every such case be deemed to have been made with a warranty or contract by the vendor to or with the vendee, that every trademark upon such chattel or article, or upon any such cask, &c., was genuine and true, and not forged or counterfeited, and not wrongfully used, unless the contrary shall be expressed in some writing, signed by or on behalf of the vendor, and delivered to and accepted by the vendee."

Sec. 20 contains a similar enactment with respect to "any description, statement, or other indication of or respecting the number, quantity, measure, or weight of such chattel or article, or the place or country in which such chattel or article shall have been made, manufactured, or produced." It is singular that the word "quality" is here omitted.

Now, these two sections may give rise to a flood of litigation. They turn what was previously matter of representation into matter of contract, and however innocent a vendor may be of any fraudulent intention, they render him liable to legal proceedings if the wares which he sells bear any trademark or particular description which is not strictly applicable to them. It is clear that, to a certain class of individuals who are not averse to hunting up occasions for legal proceedings, these sections will be a great comfort and satisfaction. At the same time, if we are to believe all we read, in medical and other publications, as to the tricks of many traders, who supply the public with articles of food or other necessities or luxuries, it is too true that these stringent provisions are required.

There are other sections in the statute which give a power of proceeding summarily before justices to recover penalties for the fraudulent use of trademarks, and which have already been put in force in several instances. Upon the whole, the statute is one which should be carefully studied by traders, and which may work very beneficially for the public. At the same time the necessity for such a measure is a sad confession of the want of straightforward dealing between man and man which exists in this country.

THE REPORTING SYSTEM.

WE are indebted to the writer for a copy of the following "Suggestions to the Reporting Committee:"—

"Gentlemen,—Having been favoured with a letter from your secretary, I should be wanting in respect towards those eminent persons who compose the committee for considering the reform of the present mode of reporting, if I were not to respond to your invitation—an invitation which, I think, for its frankness and modesty, reflects the greatest honour on the committee, and at the same time evinces the difficulty of the task you have undertaken. All who love the law must earnestly desire that what is not statutory should be as certain as possible, and as we have the highest authority for the assertion, that there is no such thing as an authorised report, that our reports should be fewer and indisputable. But it would be a grievous mistake, on the one hand, to make the presiding judge subservient to the reporter, or, on the other hand, the reporter to the presiding judge; each must be independent of the other, yet both must practically concur in a perfect report. Hitherto, in my opinion, the reporter has not held a sufficiently high position in the court, in view of the enormous influence of precedent. I think, therefore, that an office, approaching that of the judicial in form and dignity, should be assigned to those persons in each court who determine what shall be precedent. Consequently I am in favour of a public reporter for each court, to be appointed and paid by the Government, at a salary of not less than 1500*l.* per annum, who shall be provided with a suitable sitting in the court, and with whom shall be left all such copies of proceedings as are required to be deposited in court, and without whose presence or representation, nothing whatever should be heard. I should suggest, that the public reporter should be at liberty to employ such assistant reporters as he should think fit; that the form and style of his reports should be left to his discretion; that he should be bound to issue his reports monthly; that the expenses attendant upon the employment of existing reporters, and the preparing, printing, and publishing of his reports should be a charge upon the Inns of Court, who should be authorised to reimburse themselves by collection from their members of such an annual sum as should be sufficient for that purpose; that the annual accounts of the public reporter shall be audited by the Inns of Court; that each of the members of the said Inns should be entitled as such to one copy of each volume of reports, free of charge; that, within three months from the publication of any volume of the Court Reports, the presiding judge should signify to the public reporter anything which might appear to the said judge erroneous in the reports, and whether the public reporters admit, or do not admit the same, the passage should be amended or noted, as the case might be, in the next volume of reports; that all the reporters of all the courts should form together the council of reporters; that the council of reporters should assemble periodically, as they should think fit, to consider what, in their opinion, seemed conflicting cases, and should report the same annually to the House of Lords or Privy Council, according as either might be the supreme court of appeal in the subject-matter, in order that it might be judicially and finally determined which of the decisions in the said conflicting cases should prevail; that the same council of reporters should also annually report to Parliament what, in their opinion, would be desirable amendments of the existing law; that the court reports alone should be citable; that the owners of the existing reports should be compensated; that the revision and digestion of the cases should be effected by the same statute, to be styled "An Act for Revising and Digesting Cases, and for providing authorised Reports of the Decisions at Law and in Equity."

It may be objected, however, that a public reporter, with a certain stipend, may become remiss or negligent in the performance of his duties; but equally so may a judge, and both ought to be removable for wilful neglect, or default, or plain incapacity. It is, at all events, more likely that a reporter who is not adequately remunerated will grow careless, than one who is stimulated to the zealous discharge of his duties by a sufficient stipend, and a sense of responsibility. The past history of reporting only shews, that the Scylla of monopoly has been avoided by the Charybdis of license; if, then, there shall now be an interregnum of something which is not in the nature of private enterprise, but public property, I am inclined to think, that both the Bar and the public will derive benefit from the change. Conceive, gentlemen, the office of registrar or chief clerk as one of private enterprise! Yet either office, so constructed, would be less liable to exception than that of reporter, for all parties interested are represented before the registrar or chief clerk; but how, at present, is the public represented in the drawing up of reports which profess to affect its interests? The office of the judge is not one of private enterprise, and the office of reporter ought to be assimilated to it; corruption, or influence, is not less hypothetical as operating upon the one than the other. There is an apprehensive indolence, which is extremely prejudicial to progress—"a lion is in the way" is a cry that represents an evil conservatism, that prevails for centuries. If it be feared that, in digesting the cases, we may omit something valuable in decision, how easy to redecide it! What if, by somewhat lessening the number of reported cases, judges should be given a little more discretion upon the law and facts, and not become, as they seem likely to become, mere expositors of precedents, in which one mistake often serves to justify another? That these changes which I have mentioned involve continuous and zealous exertions on the part of those who shall constitute the proposed system of reporting, is undeniable; but it is time that our reports should cease to be of so voluminous a character, and of so protean a form, otherwise, I foresee that our judges, in self defence, will begin to repudiate altogether any reference to so uncertain, so expansive, and albeit unauthorised a thing, as modern precedent, and, breaking free from those fetters which modern ingenuity has attempted to bind too closely, proceed to exercise somewhat more of that high faculty of reasoning, which the name of judge implies.

I am, Gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

Rolls Chambers, Chancery-lane,
Feb. 11, 1864.

G. L.

The Right Hon. Sir William Erle, Knt., Lord Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, has appointed the following gentlemen to be Perpetual Commissioners for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women:—William Holland, of Bedford-row, Middlesex, in and for the county of Middlesex, also in and for the city and liberties of Westminster, and the city of London; Horatio Compigne, of Gosport, Hants, in and for the county of Hants; and Lewis Crombie, of Wandsworth and Lambeth, Surrey, in and for the county of Surrey.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, Feb. 18.

Earl Romney asked the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, whether the Government intended to consider the state of the law regarding the removal of clerks of the peace from their office, with the view of proposing an amendment in the law. These officers had very important duties to perform, and it was very desirable that, in cases of embezzlement, and other such cases, there should be no doubt as to the power of the magistrates to dismiss them. At present, the law in this respect was in a very unsatisfactory state.

The Lord Chancellor said that he would take the subject into consideration, and confer with the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with a view of seeing whether a bill might not be brought in to effect an improvement in the law.

Lord Cranworth said, that if clerks of the peace were convicted of embezzlement or other offences, there could be no difficulty in saying, that then they should be removable as of course. It was suggested, and the point might be worth considering, that as the judges were removable by the Crown, upon an address voted by both Houses, so something in the nature of an address from the court of quarter sessions to the Lord Chancellor, should give him jurisdiction.

Tuesday, Feb. 23.

The Marquis of Salisbury moved, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty for returns of the number of convicts under sentence of penal servitude, confined in gaols other than Government prisons in the years 1862 and 1863; and to ask the Government whether any, and what, steps have been taken to carry out the recommendations of the Commission on Penal Servitude."

Earl Granville was understood to assent to the motion, stating at the same time, that many of the recommendations of the commission on this subject had been embodied in a bill now before the other House, and the whole question could best be discussed when that bill was before their lordships.

After some observations from the Earl of Carnarvon, Lord Wodehouse, and Earl Grey, the returns were agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, Feb. 18.

Mr. R. Long inquired of the Home Secretary, whether he intended to introduce a bill for amending the Highway Act this session, and if so, how soon it would be laid upon the table of the House.

Sir G. Grey said, that several suggested amendments had been under his consideration, and he was still receiving memorials from quarter sessions and other public bodies upon the subject, and he could not introduce any measure until they had been fully considered. Any amendments which might be proposed would go, not to the principle, but merely to the details, of the act of last session.

Mr. Rogers desired to know whether, after a county had been divided into highway districts, under the act of 1862, facilities would be afforded to rural parishes, where the population, according to the last census, was more than 3000, and such parishes desired to withdraw from such districts, by adopting the Local Government Act of 1858.

Sir G. Grey said, that his own opinion was, that it was undesirable that rural parishes, when once they had been included in highway districts formed by order of the court of quarter sessions, should withdraw themselves, by the adoption of a local act. It was not intended to give them any facilities for doing so, beyond those which they now possessed by law.

Sir G. Grey (Home Secretary) moved for leave to bring in a bill, founded on the report of the commissioners, relative to the operation of the systems of penal servitude and transportation.

Mr. Adderley could not resist the conviction that the measure proposed to be introduced was founded upon a wrong principle. If no one more competent undertook the task, he would himself submit a bill to the House, based on the contrary principle to that embodied in the bill of the Government, and allow Parliament to decide between the two.

Lord Naas, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Cave, Mr. C. Fortescue, Sir J. Packington, Mr. Childers, Mr. Newdigate, Mr.

Marsh, Mr. Walpole, and Sir George Grey, in reply, having addressed the House, Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Leave was given to Mr. W. Ewart to bring in a bill to render permissive the use of the metric system of weights and measures in this country. The bill was read a first time.

Friday, Feb. 19.

Mr. W. Ewart gave notice that, on the first opportunity after Easter, he would make a motion for the repeal of the punishment of death.

Mr. Morritt asked the right hon. baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether it was finally decided that the assizes should be moved from York to any other place.

Sir G. Grey said, that there was no intention of removing the assizes from York. Whatever was done, it was contemplated that the assizes should be held at York for the greater part of the county. What had taken place was, that memorials from various towns in Yorkshire had been presented to her Majesty, praying that she would, in virtue of the powers conferred upon her by act of Parliament, divide that county into districts for the purpose of holding assizes. These memorials had been referred by her Majesty to a Committee of the Privy Council, which, after careful consideration, had agreed to recommend that a separate assize should be held in that part of the county called the West Riding. No final decision had yet been come to, nor had any Order in Council yet been passed.

Sir J. D. Hay moved an address praying her Majesty to nominate the town of Wakefield as the assize town for the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Mr. Leatham seconded the motion.

Sir G. Grey opposed the motion; which, after Mr. Beauchamp, Mr. Roebuck, Colonel Smyth, Mr. Baines, Sir J. Pakington, and Mr. Hadfield had addressed the House, was rejected, on a division, by a majority of 19—i. e. 138 to 119.

Mr. Warner, who had given notice of an intention to call attention to the operation of the law of settlement, said, as he had already had an opportunity of speaking upon the subject, and as the President of the Board of Trade had declared that, in his opinion, the question of union rating was only a question of time, he thought he should best serve the cause he advocated by not pressing any motion at present, and await the decision of the committee upon the subject of the poor law.

The House went into committee on the Insane Prisoners Act Amendment Bill.

On clause 2,

M. G. Hardy begged to move the omission of the word "death" in line 12 of the clause.

After a debate, in which Mr. Neate, Mr. Macdonogh, Sir G. Grey, Lord R. Cecil, Mr. Hardy, Mr. M. Smith, Sir W. Jolliffe, Mr. Hunt, and Sir C. O'Loglen took part, the amendment was rejected by a majority of 6—i. e. 32 to 26.

The clause was then agreed to, as were also clauses 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. G. Langton moved the insertion of a clause placing the charge for the maintenance of insane prisoners upon the common fund of the Union.

Sir G. Grey assented to the proposal, which was then agreed to, and the House resumed.

On the motion of Mr. Bruce, leave was given to bring in the following bills:—Bill to authorize the inclosure of certain lands in pursuance of a report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales; Bill to confirm certain provisional orders under the Land Drainage Act, 1861; Bill for the amendment of the law relating to the importation of diseased cattle and unwholesome meat; and a Bill to make further provision for the prevention of infectious diseases among cattle.

Tuesday, Feb. 23.

Mr. Adderley gave notice that on Thursday next he should move for leave to introduce a bill for the consolidation of the Penal Servitude Acts for England and Scotland, omitting the provisions for licences to be at large.

Mr. Locke King moved for leave to bring in a bill extending the franchise to 101 occupiers in counties.

Sir G. Grey offered no opposition to the introduction of the bill, as it appeared to be the general disposition that the bill should be brought in, and that all debate on it should be reserved for the second reading.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

Mr. Hibbert denounced public executions, and asked the Government whether they were prepared to substitute private for public executions, and moved for papers on the subject.

Mr. Hadfield seconded the motion.

Sir G. Grey defended the practice of public executions, and concluded by stating that he was not prepared with any proposal for the alteration of the law.

Alderman Sidney, Lord H. Lennox, Mr. B. Carter, and Lord Grey de Wilton having spoken on the subject.

Mr. Hibbert withdrew his motion.

Mr. S. Fitzgerald moved for copies of all correspondence between the various departments of her Majesty's Government, or officers in her Majesty's service, and Messrs. Laird Brothers, relating to the two ironclad vessels, The El Tousson and El Monassia, building by that firm, and seized by order of her Majesty's Government; and of any papers or correspondence that have passed between her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States, or their representative, Mr. Adams, relating to the said vessels.

The Attorney-General defended the Government; and Mr. Horsfall, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. W. E. Forster, Sir H. Cairns, The Solicitor-General, Mr. Walpole, Mr. T. Baring, and Mr. S. Fitzgerald having spoken on the question,

Sir G. Grey wished to be clearly understood, before the House proceeded to a division, that the papers asked for in the latter part of the motion the Government were ready to grant; and that the negative which the Government gave to the motion applied only to the former part, relating to the correspondence between the various departments of Government and Messrs. Laird.

The House then divided; the numbers were:—

For the motion..... 153

Majority..... —25

Mr. Black obtained leave to introduce a bill for the consolidation of the acts relating to copyright in works of literature and the fine arts, and the bill was brought in and read a first time.

Sir G. Grey moved that the report on the Insane Prisoners Act Amendment Bill be agreed to.

Mr. Hunt said, that when the bill was in committee, he had stated, that "Dr. Forbes Winslow had based his opinion of Townley's insanity chiefly on his extraordinary perverted moral sense." It had been represented to him that this was not a correct statement of Dr. Forbes Winslow's theory of the case, which was, that there was great moral obliquity in Townley, and with this a mental aberration; and, viewing these conjoint conditions, Dr. Forbes Winslow came to the conclusion that he was not of sound intellect. He (Mr. Hunt) did not see much variance between this correction and what he had himself stated, but he was anxious not, in any degree, to misrepresent Dr. Forbes Winslow to the House. He protested against moral obliquity being taken into consideration at all in estimating the sanity or insanity of a prisoner.

The report was then agreed to.

Wednesday, Feb. 24.

On the motion of Mr. C. Forster, a return was ordered, shewing the amount of felons' property forfeited to the Crown in each county, city, and town in England and Wales in each of the last sixteen years; with certain other particulars.

The Insane Prisoners Act Amendment Bill was read a third time, and passed.

On the motion of Sir John Hay, an address was agreed to for copy of memorials and documents relating to the holding of a separate assize in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 5, 1864.

If any member of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science should be at a loss for a subject, we venture to recommend "The social evils caused by misplaced humanity." There is nothing, however excellent in itself, that cannot by misapplication be converted into a source of mischief, and even the glorious quality of humanity forms no exception to the rule. Misplaced humanity, more properly called "humanitarianism," has been productive of great evils to society, the existence of which is unsuspected by many, and their full extent comprehended by few. To rescue so noble a quality from perversion and prostitution would be a great deed, especially, as whoever undertakes it must make up his mind to be misunderstood and misrepresented, to find his most disinterested exertions attributed to moral deficiency on his part, and an absence of the very virtue which he is endeavouring to serve, by directing it aright.

We advert to this subject at the present moment, in consequence of the bill brought into the House of Commons by the Home Secretary, Sir George Grey, to amend the Penal Servitude Acts, and an antagonistic bill on the same subject by Mr. Adderley. It will be remembered that a great increase of street robberies accompanied with violence, and of audacious burglaries, induced the Crown in December, 1862, to issue a commission to inquire into the operation of the acts relating to transportation and penal servitude. This commission presented its report last July, when two of its members, the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Henley presented separate reports of their own entirely at variance with it. Another of the commissioners (Mr. Childers) while signing the report, dissented from a portion of it, and another (Lord Chelmsford) took no part in the proceedings. The names of the other commissioners, and the substance of the report, will be found in 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, No. 446, and two subsequent numbers.

The report of the Lord Chief Justice, to our mind at least, excels that of his colleagues in truth and sound sense, as well as in composition and expression. His Lordship there lays down the following principles:—

"It is necessary to bear in mind what are the purposes for which the punishment of offenders takes place. These purposes are two-fold; the first, that of deterring others exposed to similar temptations from the commission of crime; the second, the reformation of the criminal himself. The first is the primary and more important object: for though society has, doubtless, a strong interest in the reformation of the criminal, and his consequent indisposition to crime, yet the result is here confined to the individual offender, while the effect of punishment, as deterring from crime, extends not only to the party suffering the punishment, but to all who may be in the habit of committing crime, or who may be tempted to fall into it. Moreover, the reformation of the offender is in the highest degree speculative and uncertain, and its permanency, in the face of renewed temptation, exceedingly precarious. On the other hand, the impression produced by suffering, inflicted as the punishment of crime, and the fear of its repetition, are far more likely to be lasting, and much more calculated to counteract the tendency to the renewal of criminal habits. It is on the assumption that punishment will have the effect of deterring from crime that its infliction can alone be justified, its proper and legitimate purpose being not to avenge crime, but to prevent it" (p. 85). "It may well be doubted whether, in recent times, the humane and praiseworthy desire to reform and restore the fallen criminal may not have produced too great a tendency to forget that the protection of society should be the first consideration of the lawgiver" (p. 86).

The Government having to choose between the report of the commissioners and that of the Lord Chief Justice, took the former, the chief provisions of which they seek to embody into an act of Parliament, in which they have diluted still further whatever strength is to be found in it. To pass over minor suggestions, the commissioners propose—first, and rightly, that short sentences of penal servitude should be abolished, and seven years fixed as the minimum time. The Government bill proposes to reduce this to five years.

2. The commissioners propose transportation to Western Australia on a large scale. The principle is a just one, for certain offences at least, but the proposal has been received by that colony with such a furious opposition, that our rulers, however considerate for the criminal classes, not being prepared to sacrifice our Australian colonies for their convenience, wisely abandon the recommendation.

3. The commissioners recommend the allowing convicts under sentence to earn, by their industry and good conduct in prison, a remission of part of their sentence. This, the Government bill approves and indorses.

4. The commissioners recommend the preservation of the ticket-of-leave-system, the demonstrated source of so much mischief to society: with some modification, it is true, calculated to render it a shade less mischievous.

On perusing the report of the commissioners, of Sir G. Grey's speech, and the Government bill, one is tempted to think that the interest and happiness of convicts is the primary, and the safety and happiness of society the secondary, consideration of them all. The common sense of mankind in every age except our own has reversed this order, which we have no hesitation in saying carries on its front the impress of mistaken humanity, or humanitarianism.

We proceed to point attention to some more of the evils which this unhappy sentiment has brought upon society.

The common sense of mankind has said in every age, punish crime, not for the sake of inflicting suffering on the criminal, but in order to deter others from copying his example, and, when the punishment is not co-evil with life, to prevent the criminal from repeating it. In furtherance of this view, the laws of most countries have punished with death, murder and other serious crimes. But here up starts humanitarianism—"Man's life is a sacred thing, and must not be touched. It is legal murder to do so." Surely, however, the life of the person murdered was at least equally sacred with that of his murderer, and the latter has no right to consider himself injured if he is treated as he treated his victim.

"Of lawless force shall lawless Mars complain."

(Pope's Iliad, book 5, v. 1095.)

Sometimes the enemies of capital punishment have got themselves placed on juries with the determination of acquitting the accused, whatever the evidence against him. Here we have humanitarianism developing itself in the form of perjury.

Again: men commit serious offences against society, against the persons and property of individuals, and are righteously condemned to punishment by law. Morbid feeling steps in and says, do not punish them, or, at least, remit a portion of the punishment,—never reflecting that by this means encouragement is held out to others to copy their bad example, and an improper use made by the prerogative of mercy, one of the noblest in the hands of the Crown. Nothing can be more dangerous than systematic interference with the execution of the laws, and nothing better calculated to bring the decisions of judicial tribunals into contempt. Moreover, the determining a man's fate by a secret tribunal (be it of the Secretary of State or any other), is altogether at variance with the constitution of this country, especially when the effect of that decision is to reverse the solemn finding of a judge and jury. Here, again, we have "humanitarianism."

Again: the law, as at present administered, being totally unable to repress crimes, murder and violence stalk abroad; and in order to afford some remedy, society asks that the existing laws be put in force, and, if necessary, that more stringent ones be enacted. In steps humanitarianism again. Not more punishment; be gentle and humane. Increase the number of police, and honest men will be able to pass the streets in safety without being liable to be felled like oxen by ruffians at every corner. But it is obviously impossible to increase the number of police, so as to effect this object; and were it possible, the remedy is nearly as bad as the disease. Not only is an addition made to the police expenditure, but such a system has a tendency to degrade the national character, by teaching every man that he is to rely for protection not on his own arm, or on that of the law, but on a body of men set in motion by the Secretary of State. And here is a part of Sir G. Grey's speech particularly deserving notice:—"With respect to the increase of crime, so far as concerns the metropolis, it will be satisfactory to the House to learn the result of a comparison of the last six months of 1862 with the last six months of 1863, in reference to robberies with violence. In the last six months of 1862 there were fifty-two cases of that nature, while in the last six months of 1863 there were only twenty-six cases." He then adds, "My own belief is, that the crimes which caused so much alarm were committed by a comparatively small gang of persons, who, through the vigilance and activity of the police, were almost all apprehended and brought to justice, and who are now undergoing the penalty of their misdeeds." Credulity is supposed by some to be evidence of a happy state of mind; but, be this as it may, we confess our utter absence of belief in Sir George Grey's hypothesis.

The fate of Sir George Grey's bill remains to be seen. As we have already stated, Mr. Adderley, who succeeded last session in carrying through Parliament a bill subjecting highway robbery to corporal punishment, has announced his intention to bring in a bill founded on antagonistic principles to that introduced by the Government. We trust we have shewn, that whatever the real value of humanitarianism, we have already paid for our indulgence in the feeling far more than that value, and hope that no further claims will be made on its account.

SOME recent decisions on the amount of damages which plaintiffs are entitled to recover have served to increase the great uncertainty which surrounds this question. In most cases in which a client consults his legal adviser as to his legal rights in respect of a breach of contract or a tort done to him, the principle of law which ought to regulate the advice which he receives is clear and well defined, and the difficulty, if any, consists in the application of that principle to the facts of the particular case; but on this question of damages there appears to be no ascertained principle of assessment, and we find the most learned judges disagreeing with each other on the subject; and the remark applies as well to actions of tort as to actions on contracts. Thus, in the case of Johnson v. Stear (10 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 99), the facts were, that the bankrupt had deposited certain dock warrants for brandy in dock as security for a loan; and it was agreed that the pledgee might sell the brandy if the loan was not repaid on the 29th January. The pledgee sold the brandy on the 29th January, and delivered the dock warrants to the purchaser on the 29th January, and the purchaser took possession on the 30th January. The bankrupt would not have redeemed the dock warrants:—Held, that the sale and delivery of the dock warrants was a conversion by the pledgee; but as to the damages, held by Erle, C. J., Byles and Keating, JJ., that they were merely nominal; by Williams, J., that they were the whole value of the goods at the time of the conversion.

Thus, upon a very clear and limited set of facts, there is, in this case, the widest possible difference of opinion between the judges as to the measure of damages: the conflicting judgments deserve attentive perusal; the ground of the difference of opinion appears to be, that the three judges, who held the damages to be nominal, considered that the property or interest of the pledgee in the brandy was not determined by the premature sale on the 29th January, while Williams, J., held that it was; and we cannot help thinking that his judgment is more consistent with established rules of law and previous decisions than that of the other members of the Court. The fact that the bankrupt would not have redeemed the dock warrants had the sale been deferred to the 30th January, and therefore that the sale on the 29th made no difference to him, surely ought not to bear upon the question. The question is, whether the premature sale determined the interest of the pledgee in the goods? If it did, the property in them immediately reverted to the bankrupt, and as he was entirely deprived of them by the sale, his damages were their full value. The consideration that he still owed the debt in respect of which they were pledged, ought not to be introduced into the case, as in law there was a remedy for that debt. We offer, however, these remarks with the greatest diffidence, but we may certainly appeal to this case as an instance of the great uncertainty which exists as to the principle upon which damages are to be assessed.

Another recent decision to which we would call the attention of our readers is that of Duckworth v. Ewart (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 214). The marginal note runs thus—"The defendant, an incumbrancer on land, broke a covenant which he had made with the plaintiff, a speculator, to join in a conveyance to A., with a view to a project by which the plaintiff was to realise the value of the land, as building land, with profit to himself:—Held, per Pollock, C. B., and Bramwell, B., that he was only liable in damages for the expenses of preparing the deed of conveyance; per Martin, B., that he was liable, in addition, for the loss of profit to the plaintiff." The learned baron appears, in his judgment, to have looked at the case as a common case of breach of contract, while the Chief Baron and Bramwell, B., considered that it was within that class of cases in which it has been held, that on the breach of a contract for the sale of lands, the expenses of investigating the title, &c., are the measure of damages. Speaking, again, with the utmost diffidence, we are inclined to think that the latter is the correct view.

Whichever is the right opinion, the case presents another instance of the uncertainty of the principle on which damages are to be assessed. There are excellent books on the subject, those of Messrs. Sedgwick and Mayne; and yet there is perhaps no subject on which the law is in a more unsatisfactory state; and the difficulty in applying a remedy is extreme, for of course the Legislature cannot pass a law by which damages are in all and every case to be regulated, and no one decision in the House of Lords would govern every question which may arise. Still such a decision might clear away many doubts and difficulties, and put an end to much of the uncertainty with which the well-known case of Hadley v. Baxendale (23 L. J., Ex., 178), and the many extensions and applications—and, perhaps, misapplications—of that decision have involved the subject.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—In your leading article of the 27th February, you refer to the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in the recent case of Suffield v. Brown, for the purpose of expressing your dissent from the remarks there made on the case of Pyer v. Carter (1 H. & Norm. 916). I venture to think that the same fallacy pervades your remarks and the judgment in Pyer v. Carter, viz. that of ignoring the fact that the alleged servient tenement was sold first, by the owner of both, who retained the alleged dominant tenement, and afterwards sold it to another purchaser. Had it been the case that the alleged dominant tenement had been sold first, there could not have been a doubt that the purchaser would, as against his vendors and his subsequent assignees, have been entitled to the enjoyment of the easement claimed; but, as the case was, the only ground on which Pyer v. Carter can be supported is, that on the grant of one tenement by the owner of two adjoining tenements, there is an implied reservation of all continuous and apparent easements. It is admitted that it was not an easement of necessity that was claimed, as the purchaser could have made a communication from under his own premises with the main sewer at a very trifling cost. In support of this position, you adduce two cases, Riviere v. Bower (1 Ry. & M. 24) and Swansborough v. Coventry (9 Bing. 305). These do not seem to me to establish it very clearly.

In the former, a lessee was prevented from obstructing a window of his lessor, who occupied the adjoining house, in a manner which would have been prevented if he had been a perfect stranger to the lessor. In the latter case, the owner of a house and land adjoining, sold the house and land to different purchasers at the same time; and it was held, that the purchaser of the house had a right to have his windows free from any obstruction by the purchaser of the land. Here, although the sales were simultaneous, the case was held to be within the general rule, that a grantor cannot derogate from his own gift. Pyer v. Carter was a much stronger case.

In the case of Dodd v. Birchall (8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1180), which was a case of a right of way, Martin, B., remarked, that he thought the case of Pyer v. Carter had gone to the extreme verge of the law. In the same case, Wilde, B., says, "Where a man has used his premises in a certain way for some time, and it can be brought home to the knowledge of the purchaser, the conveyance may be supposed to be made with an intention of reservation on the part of the grantor, and the land passes subject to such a user. But here there are no such facts, and I think it would be most dangerous, the deed being silent on the point, to assume such a reservation between the parties." The case of Ewart v. Cochrane (7 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 925), where Pyer v. Carter is certainly quoted as laying down the law, was a case in which the alleged dominant tenement was sold first. In conclusion, my argument amounts to this—first, that the vendor, having granted one of two adjoining tenements without reserving any easement, would not, as between his purchaser and himself, have any right to an easement except such as was of necessity, and except, perhaps, a continuous and apparent easement, the knowledge of which could be brought home to the purchaser; secondly, that a subsequent purchaser of the other tenement is in the same position as his vendor, who cannot derogate from his previous grant to the first purchaser, so as to create any right which the vendor himself did not possess; and, therefore, as the case of Pyer v. Carter, the alleged easement was not of necessity, and it was not shewn that the purchaser of the first tenement was aware of the existence of the drain, I venture to think that the case was erroneously decided.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

728, Spruce-street, Philadelphia,
Feb. 5, 1864.

SIR,—A recent number of your "Jurist" (ante, p. 5), in referring to a little tract of mine called "The Reporters," contains, along with some more flattering references to the work, the following remarks:—

"THE REPORTING SYSTEM."

"In our article of the 26th December, 1863, on the duties of the committee appointed at the meeting of the Bar in Lincoln's-inn Hall to inquire into the reporting system, we referred to the statement made by Mr. Daniel, that the cause of the cessation of the Year-Books in the 27 Hen. 8, was to be found in the rapacity of that monarch, who wanted for other purposes the money which had been set apart for the salaries of the reporters; adding, that no authority was cited for this assertion, and we were not in a condition either to confirm or refute it. Mr. Daniel has since informed us that he is under the impression that he cited an authority for it; but, be this as it may, the authority on which he relies is the work of Mr. William Wallace, an American writer, intitled 'The Reporters, chronologically arranged,' third edition, Philadelphia, 1855, which may be seen in the library of Lincoln's-inn. The passage, which is at p. 75, runs as follows:—

"The Year Book of Hen. 8, particularly after the 12th year of that king, is said to be inferior to any of the Year Books which preceded it—a fact which is attributed to the very efficient cause, that the stipend which had been paid in former reigns was dropped in the time of Hen. 8."

"It is worthy of observation, that in the preceding page we are informed, and truly, that there is no Year Book of that reign previous to the 12th year. The only years of Hen. 8 are the 12th, 13th, 14th, 18th, 19th, 26th, and 27th. Neither does Mr. Wallace cite any authority for the position here advanced; and it is impossible to accept, as authority on such a subject, the ipse dixit of a person, and that, too, a foreigner living near 350 years after the event."

Will you allow me to state that the authority for the position here advanced—the position, I mean, that "the Year Book of Hen. 8, particularly after the 12th year of that king, is said to be inferior to any of the Year Books which preceded it," is a work issued from your own Bar, intitled "The Law Magazine, or Quarterly Magazine of Jurisprudence," for many years past, and still, published in your own city, London. In that work (vol. 4, p. 6; Saunders & Bennings, London, 1830) are these words:—

"The Year Books are continued down to the 27 Hen. 8; but the cases decided subsequently to the twelfth year of that king do not bear the same authority as the rest, and are not supposed to have been officially reported."

The authority for the other fact stated by me—the fact, I mean, that the inferiority above referred to, is attributed to the circumstance, that "the stipend which had been paid in former reigns was stopped in this"—is a work purely English also; a no less work than "Reeves's History of the English Law." That ornament of your bar, Mr. Reeves, writing in the last century, says as follows:—

"The Year Book (of Hen. 8) is a very scanty one, compared with those which went before, owing, probably, to persons being no longer encouraged with a stated appointment to execute this task."—Reeves's History of the English Law, vol. 4, p. 414: London, 1787. Second Edition.

Neither part, therefore, of the "position"—or statement, rather, as I myself should call it—"advanced" in my Reporters, resta, as you assume, on the authority of a "foreigner." Whatever of the ipse dixit there may be in the case, lies with your own respectable countrymen (neither of whom cites authority), rather, perhaps, than with me; though I could readily refer to the early English writers from whom even their impressions were derived.

Neither, I beg to say, is there, as you apparently intimate, an inconsistency between what I say on p. 75 and what I had stated "on the preceding page." On that preceding page I speak of cases previous to the twelfth year. On p. 75—the following page—I speak of cases after the twelfth year. But the twelfth year itself is included in neither mention. It has its independent character, of which "particularly" I do not speak.

You will do me, I am sure, the favour to give to this note the same publicity which you have given to your suggestion, that I may, perhaps, have spoken inconsistently, and without due regard, to what had been written before me.

I am, with great respect, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN WILLIAM WALLACE.

[We have much pleasure in inserting Mr. Wallace's letter. He is an able and useful writer, and we regret if we have misunderstood him, ever so slightly.]

On the first question, Mr. Wallace fully exculpates himself by shewing that he has merely copied his statement from The Law Magazine. No reference, however, is there given for that statement, and a periodical of the nineteenth century is not a book of authority for antient English law; added to which, the passage is not very clearly expressed. We doubt whether the writer meant that the Year Book of the 12 Hen. 8 was the sole good one of that reign, and all the rest indifferent. Even Sir W. Blackstone falls, apparently at least, into the error of supposing that the Year Books "are extant in a regular series," from 1 Edw. 2 to 27 Hen. 8. (See 1 Com. 71).

On the second matter, we really do not see that Mr. Wallace has any just cause of complaint against us. On the occasion to which he refers, we asserted, and are by no means disposed to shrink from the assertion, in which we trust every reflecting person will agree with us, that on the question as to the causes which produced the cessation of the Year Books in 1527, we could not think of accepting the ipse dixit of any person living 350 years after the event, and that the circumstance of that person being a foreigner certainly did not improve the matter. If Mr. Wallace is dissatisfied with this, he must thank himself for putting forward such a statement without citing any authority for it.

He now, however, does cite his authority, viz. the following passage from Reeves's History of the English Law, vol. 4, p. 414, 2nd ed.:—

"The Year Book (of Hen. 8) is a very scanty one, compared with those which went before, owing, probably, to persons being no longer encouraged with a stated appointment to execute this task."

Here, again, is only the testimony of a writer living centuries after the event, and it scarcely bears out the statement of Mr. Wallace; and still less that of Mr. Daniel, that the cessation of the Year Books was owing to the rapacity of King Hen. 8, who wanted for his own purposes the money set apart for the payment of the reporters.

We wish Mr. Wallace had given his references to the early English writers from whom, he says, the Law Magazine and Mr. Reeves derived their impressions on this subject. We are only anxious to ascertain the real truth, which we have no doubt would be acceptable to the committee on reporting which is now sitting.

But as Mr. Wallace has referred to Reeves's History, we regret that he did not add another passage from the very same page, which more fully explains Mr. Reeves's meaning, and which we take leave to recommend to the particular attention of Mr. Daniel, and all who deplore the cessation of the Year Books, and advocate the revival of that system of reporting at the present day:—"Perhaps, since a taste for all kinds of learning had begun to prevail, the opinion of this establishment of reporters was altered, and it was thought more advisable to trust to the general inclination discovered in private persons to take notes; who, probably, from a competition, would do more towards rendering this department perfect and useful, than any temptation from a fixed salary: whatever might be the reason, such a stipend was no longer continued, and the undertaking dropped."—ED.]

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—A meeting of this Society took place at its rooms, 4, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, on Monday, the 29th February, Thomas Chambers, Q. C., Common Serjeant, in the chair; when the debate on Mr. J. W. Hume Williams's paper, intitled, "The legal Notion of unsound Mind, constituting Irresponsibility for Crime, as exemplified in the Case of George Victor Townley," and the proposal of Dr. Forbes Winalow, that instead of the charge now usually given to juries in criminal cases, where insanity is set up as a defence, the following be substituted:—"Was the prisoner insane when he committed the crime, such insanity being the effect of a disorder of the brain; and was he, in consequence of this mental and physical condition, incapable at the time of exercising a healthy control over his thoughts and actions," was resumed. The adjourned debate was opened by Mr. Lindley, who was followed by Mr. Fry, Mr. Worsley, Mr. Edward Webster, Mr. W. M. Best, the Chairman, and Dr. Forbes Winalow; and Mr. J. W. Hume Williams, in reply.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday, Feb. 29.

Earl Granville moved the second reading of the Insane Prisoners' Bill.

After some observations by Lord St. Leonards and Lord Woodhouse, the bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, Feb. 25.

Mr. Cave gave notice of his intention to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is proposed to grant licenses or tickets of leave, under any circumstances, to prisoners whose sentence of death has been commuted to penal servitude for life.

Sir G. Grey said that he was glad to have an opportunity of stating, that prisoners under sentence of penal servitude for life, whether their sentences had been commuted or not, formed a distinct class, separate from the other prisoners, and not entitled to the benefit of those regulations under which the others were entitled to a remission of their sentences. The rule in the case of prisoners under sentence of penal servitude for life was, that any claim to a remission of punishment was considered on its own merits, but that no expectations of a remission of sentence were held out to them.

Mr. Adderley obtained leave to introduce a bill to consolidate the Penal Servitude Acts for England and Scotland.

Friday, Feb. 26.

Colonel W. Patten asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was his intention to introduce any bill during the present session to amend the Highways Act, passed during the last session of Parliament.

Sir G. Grey said his honourable and gallant friend was probably not aware that he had already stated, a few nights ago, in answer to a similar question, that he hoped to introduce a bill on the subject. A memorial bearing on the subject had, however, reached his hands, and he wished to consider this before bringing in the measure.

Mr. Morritt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it would be possible for Townley, lately convicted of murder, whose sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life, to obtain, by good conduct or otherwise, at any future period of his life, a license or ticket of leave to be at large and free from restraint in either this or any other country.

Sir G. Grey.—I will only repeat the answer which I gave to a question on the same subject before, namely, that convicts under sentence of penal servitude for life, whether that sentence is original or remitted, are not entitled to the benefit of those regulations by which other convicts, under certain fixed conditions, may obtain the remission of portions of their sentences.

The Conveyancers' (Ireland) Bill went through committee.

Monday, Feb. 29.

Mr. Roebuck said, that on going into Committee of Supply, he should call attention to the Report of the Inspectors of Constabulary, ordered to be printed on the 19th February, 1864, and ask the Home Secretary whether any resolution had been taken on the subject of the spy system, as carried on by the police.

Mr. Alcock wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he proposed during this session to amend the 85th clause of the Lands Clauses Act, which enabled railway companies to obtain compulsory possession of land under order of magistrates.

Mr. M. Gibson.—The Government have no intention of passing a bill to amend the 85th clause, to which the honourable gentleman refers.

Sir W. Miles (for Colonel Patten) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he intended to proceed with his bills for the amendment of the private business of the House, so as to enable parties to take advantage of them during the present session; and whether the parliamentary bar had made any communication to him with respect to a change in the system of counsel's fees.

Mr. M. Gibson said, that the two bills to which the hon.

gentleman referred stood for a second reading, and he hoped to be able to proceed with them, so that parties should have the benefit of them this session. In answer to the second question, he had to state that he had that day received a letter from an influential member of the parliamentary bar, and which he believed had the concurrence of the leaders of that bar. The communication was satisfactory, as far as it went, although, perhaps, not dealing with the whole question. The communication stated that "it was understood that it was not to be considered inconsistent with the etiquette of the parliamentary bar for any counsel to appear before a committee of either House of Parliament, if he should think fit, at a lower rate of fees in respect of daily attendances and consultations than that which had hitherto prevailed." From the conversation that passed, he understood the meaning of this document to be, that any counsel should be permitted to take a case with a small refresher, or without any; and, with regard to consultations, that the fee should be such as might be settled between the solicitor and the barrister, and without reference to the present practice of having a minimum of five guineas for each consultation. He was further informed that this consultation fee was not in future to be taken as a matter of course, but was only to be allowed in cases where the consultation was considered necessary by the parties, and had actually been held. He was told that no change was to be made in the fee upon the retainer or the fee upon the brief, each of which was to be restricted to its present amount as the minimum, namely, five guineas on the retainer and ten guineas on the brief, so that it would be now impossible to appear before a committee in any case for less than fifteen guineas. At present it was not possible to appear for less than thirty guineas, and the House would see that a very considerable reduction had been made by the parliamentary bar. He hoped that, the subject having now come under their consideration, they would be able to make such a change in their system as to admit of counsel practising before parliamentary committees under the same rules as prevailed in the ordinary courts of law.

Mr. Bentinck said, in consequence of the unsatisfactory state of things indicated by part of the answer of his right hon. friend, he wished to ask, whether, in the event of the parliamentary bar not undertaking to alter the system still further, it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to deal with the question.

Mr. M. Gibson replied, he could only say that what he had indicated was a possible course, and he would rather not commit himself further on the subject. He should prefer to leave it in the hands of the parliamentary bar.

Mr. Hadfield inquired whether it was competent for the public to employ barristers to conduct their business before parliamentary committees on such terms as they might think fit.

Mr. M. Gibson said, so far as he was informed, there was no rule of the bar in general which would prevent counsel practising before parliamentary committees from taking the same fees as were permitted to be accepted in the courts of law and equity. Whatever rules there were upon the subject were made by the parliamentary bar, and it was altogether a question of professional etiquette.

Mr. R. Peel obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes in Ireland.

Tuesday, March 1.

Mr. Hibberd asked the President of the Poor-law Board whether, with a view to simplify and render more easy of reference the very numerous statutes relating to the relief of the poor, any effort was being made by the Poor-law Board to procure the consolidation of such statutes.

Mr. Villiers said, that the Poor-law Board did not at present contemplate making any effort to consolidate the statutes relating to the poor.

The Conveyancers' (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

In the parliamentary debate on disqualified witnesses (House of Commons, Feb. 12, 1861), referring to the case of Maden v. Catnach, Sir G. C. Lewis said, "He would read from Starkie on Evidence, which was known to be a standard work upon the subject, a statement of the law as applicable to the case (vide Examination as to Religious Belief, pp. 115, 116). That is a clear statement of the rule of law upon the subject."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 12, 1864.

THE bill introduced into Parliament by Sir Fitzroy Kelly, intitled "A Bill to amend an Act of the Eleventh and Twelfth Years of her Majesty, c. 78, to provide a further Appeal in Criminal Cases, and for the further Amendment of the Administration of the Criminal Law," the object of which is to allow of new trials in criminal cases, stands for a second reading; and as its effect would be to produce almost a revolution in our criminal procedure, we trust that, notwithstanding the strife of the two great political parties, and we fear we must add the probability of foreign war, it will be received with the attention its importance deserves.

The strongest argument in favour of the proposed change is to be found in the system followed at the Home Office with respect to pardoning and remitting sentences of convicted criminals. One object of the bill is to put an end to that system, and, as it is scarcely possible that any change could be for the worse, the proposal of Sir Fitzroy Kelly stands at least a chance of turning out an improvement. This ought not, however, to deter us from examining the proposal on its merits.

It might at first sight be imagined, that Sir Fitzroy Kelly's object was to extend to criminal proceedings the practice which exists in civil suits, of granting a new trial when there are legal and reasonable grounds for believing that the verdict found by the jury is against the evidence. But it is nothing of the sort: as is apparent not only from the provisions of the bill, but from its very preamble, which, after referring to the statute establishing the Court of Criminal Appeal, recites, that "it is expedient to extend the jurisdiction of the said justices and barons, and to provide an appeal by or on behalf of DEFENDANTS in criminal cases." The bill then proposes to enact (sect. 2), "Whenever any defendant shall have been found guilty of any treason or felony, it shall be lawful for her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas, her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, or the said Court of Criminal Appeal, upon motion to be made by or on behalf of such defendant, upon affidavit or otherwise, to grant a rule to shew cause why the verdict of guilty so found, and all proceedings, if any, thereupon had, should not be set aside, and a new trial had, or a verdict of not guilty be entered in lieu thereof, and judgment thereupon, or why the judgment should not be arrested or reversed; and in case any such rule shall be granted, the matter of such rule shall be heard and determined before the said Court of Criminal Appeal; and the said Court shall have full power and authority to hear and determine the matter of the said rule, and to order that the verdict of guilty, and all proceedings, if any thereupon had, shall be set aside, and that a new trial shall be had, and that a verdict of not guilty shall be entered in lieu thereof, and of the judgment thereupon, if any judgment shall have been given, or that the judgment shall be arrested or reversed, or to make such other order as justice shall require: provided, that no such motion shall be made, unless a Barrister-at-law shall have certified under his hand that there is, in his judgment, reasonable ground to appeal: provided also, that if it shall appear to the said Court of Criminal Appeal that any new or further inquiry is expedient, as to any particular question of fact or otherwise, but that it is not expedient that the whole case should be tried again, it shall be lawful for the said Court to order such question to be tried in the like manner, and before the same Court, as would have tried the case if a new trial had been granted; and every such question shall be inserted in a rule, and the jury shall be duly sworn to try the said question; and in every such case it shall be lawful for the said Court of Criminal Appeal, if it shall think fit, to postpone its determination as to the said rule, until such question shall have been so tried, and then to determine the said rule: provided also, that in every case in which any application shall be made on the ground of the alleged insanity of the defendant, the said Court of Criminal Appeal, if it shall think there be reasonable ground for an inquiry into such insanity, may order the question to be tried separately, whether any other question may, or may not, be ordered to be tried." The other sections of the bill (there are 18 sections in all) contain the machinery for carrying out this object.

It will be seen from the above that the bill is both avowedly and actually a bill for the benefit of defendants in criminal cases, and therefore, according to all true principles of legislation, we are bound to inquire, what is the existing evil which renders desirable the proposed alteration of the law,—before we even think of the remedy, we should first ascertain the nature of the disease.

Now, will it be contended that British juries are in the habit of erroneously convicting accused persons. If so, a more unfounded charge was never brought against any body of men. If our juries had been charged with erroneously acquitting them, a good deal might be said. We frequently see persons, of whose moral guilt no reasonable doubt could be entertained, acquitted because the legal proof falls short, or because some fantastic scruple arises in the minds of the jury; but the cases where an accused person, who has both moral and legal merits in his favour, is convicted, are in our day rare; and where the offence charged is one affecting life, so rare as almost fit to be characterised as nonentities. Yet it is for such cases that Parliament is now asked to legislate; while for the vastly more numerous cases of improper acquittal the law is to remain in its present state. "Ad ea quæ frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur" is a maxim not only of English law, but of general jurisprudence, which, if the present bill passes, ought to be reversed. Moreover, the want of reciprocity in this bill shews incontestibly that the equal administration of justice between Crown and subject is not its object. A few years since a bill was introduced into the House of Commons by some hon. member (we believe Mr. M'Mahon) resembling in many respects that of Sir F. Kelly, but containing a clause, that the Court above might in its discretion grant a new trial when the verdict was in favour of the accused, if it deemed that verdict contrary to the evidence; but that clause was received by the House with a disapprobation so unequivocal that no person has since repeated the experiment, and Sir F. Kelly declines to do so now. It is, perhaps, needless to observe, that the granting an appeal to one of the litigant parties, and not to the other, is a violation of every principle of justice, and is only worthy of that unhappy class of the community which looks on all criminal law as a natural enemy, and deems all means allowable to rescue victims from its clutches. Good citizens look up to the law as their protector, and the preserver of the peace of society, and bear in mind its maxim, "Minatur innocentes qui parcit nocentibus."

There is one argument in favour of Sir F. Kelly's bill which is worthy of notice. By the existing law new trials may be granted in criminal cases tried in the Court of Queen's Bench; and there is, at least, one case in the books, Reg. v. Scaife (2 Den. C. C. 281), in which that Court granted a new trial in felony. Now, it may very fairly be asked why this difference—what reason is there that a man, who has the good fortune to be tried in the Queen's Bench, has the right to move for a new trial if the verdict is against him, while, if tried at the assizes, he has no such right? We confess we see none; but if legislation on this subject is called for, it may be a question whether the practice of other criminal courts ought to be assimilated to that of the Queen's Bench, or that of the Queen's Bench assimilated to them. In any event, if the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench is to be taken as the model, why not take it in its entirety? In other criminal courts the person on his trial is placed at the bar, exposed to the view of the jury and the public—a practice beneficial on many grounds, too numerous to specify on the present occasion. In the Court of Queen's Bench this is not so; the accused may be present as one of the auditory, and perhaps not present at all.

There are many other objections, both to the principle and details of Sir F. Kelly's bill. If passed, it certainly will be a great comfort to the criminal classes of the community, especially such criminals as are of the wealthier order; who will be further relieved by another bill now before the House, introduced by Mr. C. Foster, namely, to abolish all forfeiture on conviction of treason or felony. Whether this simply means that a criminal shall not forfeit lands or goods, or whether it goes farther and protects him from the forfeiture of civil rights, we are not aware. If the latter, it certainly would be an edifying scene to witness a convict under sentence of penal servitude, perhaps for murder or felonious assault, brought up by habeas corpus to exercise his right of voting at an election for members of Parliament. But taking for granted that the bill does not go that length, it would be something very like a mockery of justice to see a rich criminal, who is waiting his execution for treason or murder, send for his lawyer, and draw up deeds disposing of his real and personal estate, with the usual conditions, limitations, clauses of forfeiture, &c., carefully providing for the payment of the stamp duty, that his children shall not marry ineligible persons, &c. Parliament has, however, got both these bills before them, and it remains to be seen how they will be dealt with.

OUR correspondent C. E. F. N. has, we think, not only mistaken the drift of our remarks in the leading article of the 27th February, last, but also the entire scope of the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in Suffield v. Brown (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 111).

Our remarks entirely turn upon the implied reservation of apparent and continuous easements by the owner upon a sale of part of a heritage, and we do not ignore the fact, therefore, "that in Pyer v. Carter the alleged servient tenement was sold first."

Our learned correspondent says, that he arrives at the conclusion, "that the vendor, having granted one of two adjoining tenements without reserving any easement, would not, as between his purchaser and himself, have any right to an easement except such as was of necessity, and except, perhaps, a continuous and apparent easement, the knowledge of which could be brought home to the purchaser." Now, if our correspondent will again carefully read the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, he will find that his observations are directed against the whole doctrine of the implied reservation of apparent and continuous easements; and his Lordship lays it down distinctly, "that the grantor cannot derogate from his own absolute grant, so as to claim rights over the thing granted, even if they were, at the time of the grant, continuous and apparent easements, enjoyed by an adjoining tenement which remains the property of him the grantor."

With regard to the case of Pyer v. Carter, our learned correspondent thinks that it was wrongly decided, because "it was not shewn that the purchaser of the first tenement was aware of the existence of the drain." But if he will look at the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, he will find that his Lordship considered that the purchaser, not only was under no obligation to make any inquiry as to the drain, but that he "would not be affected by the result of such inquiry."

The Lord Chancellor, in effect, says, that the law will not imply a reservation of apparent and continuous easements against the express grant of the grantor; our correspondent thinks the law will perhaps imply such grant when the purchaser was aware of such easements, which, ex hypothesi, he must be taken to know when they are continuous and apparent.

In our remarks upon Pyer v. Carter, we assumed that the easement in that case was apparent and continuous, but we admit that the Court, in considering it to be of such a character, went perhaps "to the verge of the law."

WE regret to observe in the papers the following scene at the Central Criminal Court, on Tuesday, the 1st March:—

Francis Giles, an attorney's clerk, surrendered to an indictment charging him with embezzling money belonging to a friendly society.

Mr. Metcalfe was counsel for the prosecution; and Mr. F. H. Lewis defended the prisoner.

Mr. Commissioner KERR, in summing up the case, pointed out circumstances in the prisoner's conduct, which, in his opinion, went to negative the suggestion of fraud, and to shew rather that the charges against the prisoner were only irregularities due to an elaborate system of forms with which he had to deal. He remarked upon the impropriety of recourse being had to a criminal prosecution in such a case, and said, that under the Friendly Societies Act, and at a cost of only a few shillings, the prisoner might have been cited before a county court judge, and ordered to pay the money in dispute; but, unfortunately, the society consulted a lawyer, and hence this prosecution.

The jury acquitted the prisoner.

The prisoner was then arraigned on another specific charge of embezzlement, alleged to have been committed under similar circumstances, and of which in the result he was also acquitted, under the ruling of the learned judge, who remarked, by the way, that it would only have been graceful for the society to have retired from the prosecution after the first verdict.

Mr. Metcalfe proposed to proceed with a third indictment against the prisoner. The learned judge, he said, had remarked, that it was a graceful act for a counsel to withdraw from a case where a jury had given a verdict which practically decided the questions in issue. He admitted that such a course was frequently taken where a verdict really appeared to be conclusive as to the whole matters in dispute; but that, in his opinion, was not so in the present case, and therefore he proposed to go on with the prosecution, knowing nothing and caring nothing, as he did, as to what was graceful or otherwise where duty and conscience imposed upon him a certain course. In such a case he had only a duty to perform to his clients, regardless of either judge or counsel. Had the Court been differently constituted, he might not have thought it necessary to make any excuse for proceeding, but—

Mr. Commissioner KERR, interposing, begged that the learned counsel would withdraw that remark, or he must adjourn the Court.

Mr. Metcalfe asked to what remark the learned judge referred.

Mr. Commissioner KERR.—The remark to the effect, that if the Court had been differently constituted you would not have made such and such observations. I call on you to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Metcalfe said, if his Lordship had not made an observation calculated to embarrass him in the discharge of his duty, he would not have made the remark which appeared to have given umbrage.

Mr. Commissioner KERR.—I will not argue the question with you. I say you have made an observation disrespectful to the Court, and, unless you retract it, I will command that the Court be adjourned.

Mr. Metcalfe.—Your Lordship made an observation reflecting on my clients and on me in the discharge of my duty to them. I did not intend to shew any disrespect towards your Lordship.

Mr. Commissioner KERR, rising from his seat and addressing the sheriffs, directed them to adjourn the Court. Turning to the jury, he said he was sorry to have to adjourn the further consideration of the case.

Mr. Metcalfe hoped his Lordship would not resort to a course which would result in the jury being locked up for the night.

Mr. Commissioner KERR should be compelled to do so unless the offensive remark were withdrawn.

Mr. Metcalfe said, if his Lordship thought he had said anything disrespectful to him he would retract it, but he did not think he had.

Mr. Commissioner KERR ventured to say that every member of the Bar would concur with him, that the remark was offensive and discourteous.

Mr. Metcalfe then withdrew the observation, explaining, in doing so, that he had only felt it his duty to protect his clients in the matter, and that he had not intended to say anything discourteous towards the Bench.

The case then proceeded on its merits.

INJUNCTION TO PROTECT THE ENJOYMENT OF PROPERTY.

(Ipsen v. The East India House Estate Company, 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 221).

THE present Lord Chancellor is remarkable for the bold and decided course which he usually takes with reference to any doubtful question of law or practice; no doubt a valuable quality in a judge. He has shewn this on several occasions, especially in his recent decisions on the law of trade marks, and in the case of Ipsen v. The East India House Estate Company, quoted above. The decision in this case has an important bearing on the practice of the Court of Chancery in granting injunctions in cases of obstruction to light.

Our readers will remember that an important distinction exists between cases where an injunction is sought to be obtained upon an interlocutory motion, and those cases in which the same application is made at the hearing of the cause. In the former case, the granting of the injunction is in the discretion of the Court; and the Court will take into its consideration the balance of convenience and inconvenience to the parties, which would attend the granting or refusal of the injunction, and a variety of other circumstances. At the hearing of the cause, on the other hand, it has always been understood that the Court will regard the rights of the parties only. Another distinction is noticed by the Lord Chancellor between injunctions which are of a preventive character, and what he terms mandatory injunctions, i. e. those which command a party to the cause to do some act, as, for example, to remove an obstruction already erected.

Strictly speaking, the term mandatory injunction is incorrect. The Court does not command a person to do a particular thing; but it produces precisely the same effect in an indirect manner. It does not command a man to pull down a house, which he has wrongfully built, but it forbids him to allow it to remain standing. The result is precisely the same; and it would be much better if the Court felt itself justified in altering its phraseology, and so putting an end to the absurdity now involved in it.

In the case of Ipsen v. The East India House Estate Company the facts were these:—The defendants having pulled down the old India House, which was immediately opposite to the plaintiff's house, proceeded to erect a new house, fifteen feet higher than the old. During the course of the erection, notices were served on the defendants not to interfere with the plaintiff's rights, and finally a bill was filed. The defendants, nevertheless, finished the house. The Lord Chancellor, reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, refused to enjoin the defendants to pull down any part of the obnoxious building; but directed an inquiry as to the amount of compensation to be paid by the defendants, as satisfaction for the damage done to the plaintiff by the obstruction to his lights. The judgment commences in these words:—“The Lord Chancellor said, that every one of these cases must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances. . . . The jurisdiction of the Court, so far as it was a preventive remedy, or a protection from further damage, was a jurisdiction exercised without any difficulty, and resting upon the clearest grounds. But there was superadded to it the remedy, by way of mandatory injunction, which was an order compelling the defendant to restore things to the condition in which they were before the plaintiff's complaint was made. The exercise of that power must be attended with the greatest possible caution. He (the Lord Chancellor) thought, without intending to lay down any rule, that it should be confined to cases where the injury done to the plaintiff could not be estimated and sufficiently compensated by pecuniary payment."

We understand his Lordship to mean, that if the building had not been erected, he would have granted an injunction to forbid the erection; but as it had been finished, he would not, under the circumstances, oblige the defendants to take it down. This would appear only reasonable if the plaintiff had lain by and allowed the building to go on; but in this case it appeared from the evidence, that notices had been given to the defendants that proceedings would be taken against them if they continued the work. The position laid down by the Lord Chancellor appears therefore, to amount to this—that whenever a man, wishing to obstruct his neighbour's lights, can succeed in running up the obnoxious structure before an injunction is actually obtained against him, then, in all cases where the injury done can be sufficiently compensated by money, he will be entitled to continue in his wrongful trespass on his neighbour's rights, on payment of a money compensation.

The observations of the Lord Chancellor appear to derive considerable support from the case of The Attorney-General v. Nichol (16 Ves. 338), which was an ordinary case of obstruction to the plaintiff's lights. Lord Eldon, in his judgment, expressly lays down that there are many cases in which the Court of Chancery will not interfere by injunction, although the value of the plaintiff's premises has been diminished, and an action on the case would accordingly be maintainable. He says, "The foundation of this jurisdiction, interfering by injunction, is that sort of material injury to the comfort of the existence of those who dwell in the neighbouring house, requiring the application of a power to prevent, as well as remedy, an evil for which damages would be given in an action in a court of law." This judgment has been cited with approval in the cases of Sutton v. Lord Montford (4 Sim. 559) and Winstanley v. Lee (2 Swanst. 333); also by Mr. Yool, in his treatise on Waste, Nuisance, and Trespass; in Gale on Easements; and in many other places.

It is, however, important to observe, that The Attorney-General v. Nichol and the other cases cited, were cases where injunctions were asked for upon interlocutory applications. Johnson v. Wyatt (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1353; 12 Weekly Rep. 234) was a motion for decree, but here the building had not been finished. We cite the following passage from the judgment of Lord Justice Turner:—"In my opinion the Court will not interfere by injunction, if the damages recoverable were trifling or inconsiderable; but as this is a case in which there has not been an unanimity among the judges of the Court, I will leave that point out of consideration." This dictum, however, hardly goes to the length of Ismberg v. The East India House Company. The Lord Justice speaks of the trifling amount of the damage done as being a reason for refusing the injunction; whereas the Lord Chancellor appears to be of opinion, that whatever the amount of damage may be, yet if it be of a nature which can be compensated by money, the injunction should be refused. The case of Jacomb v. Knight (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 529; 11 Weekly Rep. 812) seems to be open to the same observation. This was a case of a motion for decree, and also of a mandatory injunction. The decision turned in a great measure upon the question, whether a bill for an injunction could be sustained by a tenant from year to year under notice to quit. The Lord Justice Knight Bruce, after observing that the balance of inconvenience on the one side and on the other was a consideration of which the Court, in injunction cases, never lost sight, proceeded as follows:—"There is, in my opinion, no plain case rendering an injunction necessary, especially as the plaintiff can recover compensation in damages. As I said, the nuisance may be so much as to interfere with health and comfort, and to render it the duty of the Court to interfere. . . . I am of opinion that, considering the inconvenience on one side of granting the injunction, and the inconvenience on the other side of not granting it, the considerations in favour of refusing to act greatly preponderate. There may have been damage entitling the plaintiff to recover in an action, but upon the evidence as it stands before us, the damage is not serious—is not considerable—is not likely to be serious or considerable."

Whatever amount of support the Lord Chancellor's decision may derive from these authorities, it appears to be hardly consistent with the observations of Lord Kingsdown in The Imperial Gas-light Company v. Broadbent (7 H. L. C. 612), which are embodied in the marginal note to that case. Lord Kingsdown, in the course of his judgment, speaks as follows:—"The rule I take to be clearly this—if the plaintiff applies for an injunction to restrain the violation of a common-law right, and the existence of that right, or the fact of its violation, is denied, he must establish his right at law; but having done so, I apprehend that, unless there is something special in the case, he is entitled as of course to an injunction to prevent the recurrence of that violation." The present Lord Chancellor, however, lays down that in all cases in which the damage can be estimated in money, a mandatory injunction ought not to be granted. It appears to us that this is, at all events, when thus broadly stated, a new position, and is of sufficient importance to justify us in thus bringing it before the notice of our readers.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, March 4.

The Lord Chancellor brought in a bill to amend an act passed in the year 1860, authorising the appointment of an additional chief clerk in the court of the Master of the Rolls. The noble and learned lord stated, that the gentleman who was appointed in that year had ever since performed his duties zealously and laboriously. He had recently been appointed to a higher grade, and as he was named in the act of Parliament, and there was no provision made for appointing a successor, this bill was necessary to enable the vacancy to be filled up. That it was requisite that such a step should be taken would be obvious to their lordships when he stated, that of 41,300 appointments in chambers in the year 1862-63, 16,900 were disposed of by the Master of the Rolls.

The bill was read a first time.

Monday, March 7.

The Marquis of Westmeath introduced a bill to punish by whipping the offence of rape when more than one person was engaged in its commission.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, March 3.

Mr. Roebuck directed the attention of the Home Secretary to an extract from the report of the Inspector of Constabulary in England. In his report, General Cartwright, the Inspector of Police in the Eastern Counties, Midland, and North Wales district, makes this statement:—

"During my inspection in the county of Lincoln, Captain Bicknell, the chief constable for that large and important county, brought under my notice a system which he had discovered, of private communication between individuals or societies and members of the force, which I cannot better explain than by entering the letter addressed from Captain Bicknell to the county paper upon the subject:—

"To the Editor of the Mercury.

"Chief Constable's Office, Lincoln, Aug. 19, 1863.

"Sir,—The police of this country are constantly receiving letters from private inquiry offices, seeking information as to the character, respectability, and money value of persons residing in the towns and villages, generally of small traders, but sometimes of clergy and professional men. Companies are formed for the professed object of conducting these inquiries, and the practice is becoming very prevalent. I think most persons are little aware of the system of spying that is going on, and that 'strictly confidential' communications may be passing concerning them which may be of serious injury to their prospects, and that their names may be inscribed at the offices in the 'register of persons deemed unworthy of credit.' The police of the counties and boroughs are largely applied to by these offices, and it is within my knowledge, that in some instances the information sought has been furnished, and remuneration received. Such matters, unless on criminal information, are, I conceive, beyond the province of the police; and it is to make known that I have prohibited any replies to such inquiries on the part of the constabulary of this county, and also to draw the attention of the police authorities generally to the subject, that I request the insertion of this letter in your widely circulated paper. I inclose you a specimen letter of inquiry, but not for publication.

"I am &c.,

"PHILIP BICKNELL,
Chief Constable of Lincolnshire."

Upon this General Cartwright makes these observations:—

"Considering this is a most important communication, I have made a point of inquiring whether this system has been generally in force, and I have to report, that in many counties and boroughs I find it to be of common practice. Feeling deeply how injurious such a system must be to the well-being of the force, I cannot too strongly impress upon you my firm belief that unless it is at once suppressed the support the force receives from the public will be greatly damaged, if not entirely withdrawn. According to the title of the act under which the force is established, it is stated to be for the more effectual prevention and detection of crime, suppression of vagrancy, and maintenance of good order. The duties here are so well defined that it must be clear to every one that any strictly confidential inquiries into private means and character between individuals or societies and police officers is one of the most dangerous transgressions of duty that can be imagined. The efficiency of the force depends upon its popularity, which, if removed, is fatal to its main support; as, according to its efficiency, it becomes popular, so according to its popularity it becomes efficient. In my circuit of inspection, wherever I have mentioned this subject to any of those in command of forces it has met with their immediate reprobation. This course of action may check the system referred to, but I consider it of such vital importance to the force, that I have thought it my duty to bring it under your immediate consideration."

Sir G. Grey:—No doubt the practice to which General Cartwright has called attention is a very objectionable one, and the employment of the police in certain parts of the country, not under the authority of their officers, in making these inquiries, is altogether foreign to the object for which the police force was established. As soon as my attention was called to this passage in General Cartwright's report, I directed a circular to be addressed to the chairmen of quarter sessions in counties, and to the chairmen of watch committees in boroughs possessing a separate police force, and to the police authorities in Scotland. This is the form addressed to the chairmen of watch committees:—

"Whitehall, Feb. 3.

"Sir,—I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to request that you will call the attention of the watch committee to the inclosed extract from the last report of Lieutenant-General Cartwright, one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary, respecting a system of private communication which appears to be in operation between individuals or societies and members of the constabulary force; and I am to request that inquiries may be made upon this subject with reference to the police of your borough, and that special instructions may be given to prevent a practice which is open to very serious objection.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"H. A. BRUCE.

"The Chairman of the Watch Committee."

I have received a great many letters in answer to this circular, and, although some replies are still wanting, I am happy to say that the general result shews that the practice exists in only a very few instances, and, attention having been called to the subject, and strict injunctions given against the practice, I hope that a continuance of it will now be effectually prevented.

The Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

Friday, March 4.

Sir G. Grey moved the second reading of the Penal Servitude Acts Amendment Bill.

Mr. Adderley moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

This was seconded by Mr. Beach, and, after a debate, in which Mr. G. Hardy, The O'Connor Don, Sir W. Miles, and Sir G. Grey took part, the amendment was withdrawn, and the bill read a second time.

Monday, March 7.

The Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

Tuesday, March 8.

Mr. Childers gave notice, that in the committee on the Penal Servitude Acts Consolidation, he should move certain amendments bearing on the subject of transportation.

Colonel W. Patten, referring to what had fallen from the President of the Board of Trade last week on the subject of the fees of the Parliamentary Bar, said that this statement had attracted the attention of the parties interested in the subject; and he had received a communication from a leading member of the Parliamentary Bar, Mr. Hope Scott, in which it was stated that the sum to be paid for any counsel to appear before a private committee was no more than ten guineas. He, therefore, asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he still believed that the sum to be paid for counsel was fifteen guineas, or whether it was not, as stated by Mr. Hope Scott, ten guineas only.

Mr. M. Gibson said that the fact stated that any counsel would be permitted to take ten guineas only, was a considerable change and a great relief to the suitors. It was handsome on the part of the Parliamentary Bar to make that concession.

Mr. G. Chre moved for a select committee to inquire into the expediency and practicability of abolishing turnpike trusts.—Agreed to.

The Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes (Ireland) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Wednesday, March 9.

Mr. Neale gave notice, that in committee on the Penal Servitude Acts, he would move the omission of clause 2.

Mr. W. O. Gore moved the second reading of the Trepass (Ireland) Bill, which, after a few words from Sir Robert Peel, was read a second time.

Mr. H. Bruce moved the second reading of the Watching of Towns (Ireland) Bill.

After a debate, in which Sir Robert Peel, Lord Naas, Mr. Herbert, Sir F. Heygate, Mr. George, Colonel Dumas, Dr. Brady, Captain Archdall, Colonel Vandeleur, Major Gore, and Mr. Sullivan, and Sir H. Bruce took part, the bill was withdrawn.

Mr. W. Swart moved the second reading of the Metrical System of Weights and Measures Bill. He explained that its object was to make that system permissive.

Mr. Locke seconded the motion.
Mr. M. Gibson, Mr. Henley, Mr. Adderley, Mr. Hankey, Mr. Walter, Mr. J. B. Smith, Colonel Sykes, Mr. Buxton, Colonel Barttelot, and Mr. Baines having spoken, the House divided.

For the second reading..... 90

Majority —38

Mr. Adderley gave notice that on Friday next upon the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, he should move the following resolution:—"That this House is of opinion that the system of discharge of prisoners from penal servitude on license without police supervision, shall no longer be continued."

SHIPPING LAW.

THE SHIPPING LAW MANUAL: a concise Treatise on the Law governing the Interests of Shipowners, Merchants, Masters, Seamen, and other Persons connected with British Ships. Together with the Acts of Parliament, Forms, and Precedents relating to the subject. Being especially intended for popular use in Seaport Towns. By W. T. GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. Greenhow, brings into a popular shape, and to the latest date, the entire body of legal regulations affecting the shipping trade of the country alike in relation to owners, merchants, masters, and seamen, and is especially adapted for ordinary use by all persons connected with the business of seaport towns."—Times, Jan. 31, 1863.

"The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. But Mr. Greenhow has achieved it, and placed within the reach of every one connected with shipping a valuable compendium of the law relating to that branch of industry."—Shipping and Mercantile Gazette.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 19, 1864.

PREVIOUS to the Reformation, in this, as in most, if not all, countries, where the religion of Rome prevailed, and religious orders were recognised, a person who, in the words of Littleton, "entered and professed in religion," as monk or nun, and thus took the vows of "obedience, voluntary poverty, and perpetual chastity," became civilly dead. The result of this civil death, as far as regards succession to property, was similar to that of natural death. If the monk was seised in fee, his heir succeeded to his lands, or if he were one of two joint tenants, the lands survived to the other. He might, moreover, have made his will, and his executors might have brought actions in respect of debts due to him "as if he were dead, indeed."

If, moreover, he made no executors when he entered into religion, then the Ordinary might commit the administration of his goods to others "as if he were dead, indeed." (Litt., sect. 200; Co. Litt. 132. a, 132. b.)

It followed, as a natural consequence of this doctrine, that monks or nuns could not, after their profession, take property of any kind, but that it devolved in course of law upon those who would have succeeded to it had the monks or nuns been actually instead of civilly dead.

Coke, in his Commentary upon Littleton, takes a distinction between profession in a foreign country and profession in England, laying it down that the common law takes no knowledge of profession in a foreign country, "because it wanted the trial;" whereas a profession in a house within the realm may be tried by certificate of the Ordinary. Whether there was any ground for the distinction is, at least, doubtful. (1 Domat, by Strahan, p. 26).

According to the old French law, the estates of persons who were professed religious did not go to the monastery, but to their heirs, or those to whom they were pleased to give them. And they could not dispose of them to the use of the monastery. (Ib.)

In those times there was a reality in the vow of poverty, and the notional death of the professed person was carried out fully into all its logical consequences.

Since the Reformation, however, it is generally understood, that a person does not become civilly dead by becoming a monk or nun; and of late years, as the laws against Roman Catholics have been relaxed, and monastic institutions are springing up over the land, questions have arisen which lead us to the conclusion that the old law of civil death was founded in good sense and sound policy. At present, monks or nuns, not being civilly dead, are able to acquire and hold property, and, consequently, are able to dispose of it, if the act by which the disposition is made is not liable to be set aside upon the ground of undue influence, either actually proved to have been exerted over them by their ecclesiastical superiors, or to be presumed from the position in which they are placed, and the vows which they have taken.

It seems to be clear, that if a nun were to make a gift of her property to her convent, she or her representatives might have such deed set aside upon the ground of undue influence, the exercise of which the Court of Chancery, taking into consideration the vows she had taken, and the circumstances under which she was placed, would, according to the principles upon which it ordinarily acts, undoubtedly presume. (Whyte v. Meade, 2 Ir. Eq. Rep. 420). Can such a deed be enforced in equity upon the application of the nun herself?

This question was raised in the case of Fulham v. McCarthy (9 Ir. Eq. Rep. 620; 12 Jur., part 1, p. 758). On bill being filed by a nun and the superioresses of the convent, to whom she had assigned her share in a residue under a will, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland (the Right Hon. Maziere Brady) dismissed the bill with costs, but, it seems, directed an issue.

There was an appeal from the decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, but the point as to the validity of the assignment was not actually decided, as the bill was dismissed on the ground of misjoinder. The decision, however, of the House of Lords shews, that in their opinion there was an important question, viz. as to the validity of the deed, to be tried between the parties who wrongly appeared as co-plaintiffs.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, however, in a very able judgment, put the question to be tried in a very forcible light; he likened the case of the gift obtained from the nun to the case of a gaoler putting his prisoner in a dungeon, and extracting a deed from him there, and then coming into court, having his victim still in his power, and saying, we want the property; the Court must give it to us, in the right of the deed; but his Lordship thought the Court would be a nuisance, if it were the medium of confirming such an instrument.

In the recent case of In re Metcalfe's Will (10 Jur. N. S., part 1, p. 224), this subject has been again discussed. There a Miss Thompson, formerly a member of the Church of England, joined the Church of Rome. Afterwards, in November, 1859, she became a professed nun in the Carmelite convent in Paris. In April, 1861, she took the black veil, and made the vows of poverty, obedience, and chastity. On the 28th June, 1862 (we presume, as a matter of course, in such cases), she executed a deed, by which she assigned all her real and personal estate, and all other, if any, the real or personal estate, of or to which she was then seised, possessed, or entitled in possession, reversion, remainder, or contingency, to Mr. Hope Scott and Mr. Serjt. Bellasis, in trust to sell, and out of the proceeds to pay their expenses and the incumbrances affecting the property, and to pay the surplus to the superior priest, for the time being, of the congregation of the Reverend Fathers of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, of Brompton, to be applied by him in his absolute discretion, and subject to no control but that of his ecclesiastical superiors. The deed then contained a covenant, by which the assignor, Miss Thompson, covenanted to convey and assign to the same trustees, and for the same purposes, all real and personal property which she might afterwards acquire, by gift, devise, descent, bequest, survivorship, or any other mode of acquisition whatsoever. The deed does not, from the report of the case, appear to have contained any power of revocation. The deed was duly enrolled.

Two months after the execution of the deed, Miss Thompson became entitled under a will to a sum of 334*l.* Consols, which the trustees paid into court.

A petition was then presented in the name of the nun, asking for the transfer of that sum to the trustees of the deed, Mr. Hope Scott and Mr. Serjeant Bellasis. Sir J. Romilly, M. R., in his very able and instructive judgment, comes to the following conclusions:—

First, that since the Reformation the law regards a professed nun, who has taken the vows, as a person not thereby legally disqualified from taking or holding property, or dealing with it in such manner as she may think fit.

Secondly, that in the case before the Court, the deed was in no respect binding upon her, and the covenant in it was one which could not be enforced either at law or in equity.

And, thirdly, the petitioner not having proceeded under the deed, his Honor said he should require the same proof, upon a petition by a nun, that he should if upon a petition by the assignee of a nun, viz. that the mode of dealing with her property was sanctioned and desired by the petitioner, unbiassed and unaffected by any vow of obedience which she might voluntarily have given, and unconstrained and uninfluenced by the position of duress in which she had placed herself. His Honor, therefore, directed the interest of the fund to be accumulated at compound interest, without making any further order on the petition, but with liberty to apply.

Upon appeal to the Lords Justices, his Honor's decision was reversed. (See 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 287). The judgment of the Court was delivered by Lord Justice Knight Bruce, in which Lord Justice Turner, without any comment, concurred.

His Lordship's judgment appears to us to be open to some observations.

In the first place, he said, "that as the appellant and the trustees of the deed all appeared, and consented to the payment of the fund, either to her or them, it was of little consequence to which of them it should be paid; and the question of the validity of the deed was immaterial."

This remark seems to be scarcely accurate; for, assuming the deed to be valid (and we presume it would be treated as if it were so, until set aside), how could the trustees of the deed, by any consent of theirs, give up the property of their cestui que trust to the person who created the trust?

His Lordship, moreover, thought that the contention, that the appellant had by her profession become civilly dead, was, irrespectively of the circumstance that that profession was foreign, "absolute nonsense."

His Lordship differed from the Master of the Rolls with regard to the question of undue influence; he thought that even if the deed had been improperly obtained from the nun, and ought to be disregarded, or even if she were under an influence which would direct her to make an unwise disposition of the property, the Court could not speculate upon her intentions; and that "to refuse to a person in her senses, and under no legal disability, the payment of a fund, to which she was absolutely entitled, merely because she was likely to deal with it in a manner which the Court might think unwise, would be to arrogate to a court of justice a power which, in his judgment, it did not possess."

These observations of his Lordship do not, in our opinion, dispose of the difficulties which surround the question, and which evidently pressed upon the Master of the Rolls; for, independently of any question as to any unwise manner in which the nun was likely to dispose of her property, there was nothing to shew that she knew of the petition being presented, or that even if she did know of it, having regard to the vows she had taken, she could be looked upon as a free agent in making the application to the Court.

It is to be regretted that the Lords Justices, in a question of such great importance, did not in any manner notice the cases upon the same subject in Ireland and in the House of Lords. Their decision, however, is in one respect deserving of consideration; it shews how, if it remains unreversed, conventional establishments may, with ease, and apparently without scandal, obtain either for themselves or for other purposes of the Church of Rome, the entire property of all who, as professed nuns, take the vows of obedience and poverty, the observance of which, at any rate, that church has so great an interest in enforcing.

If the Lords Justices have correctly laid down the law of England, in reversing the order of the Master of the Rolls (which we very much doubt), it certainly seems but right that the Legislature, which allows the existence in this country of such institutions as nunneries, should afford to nuns and their relatives the same protection, so far as their property is concerned, as now exists in most Roman Catholic countries, and which before the Reformation the fiction of civil death afforded to them in this.

SUFFIELD v. BROWN AND ISENBERG v. THE EAST INDIA HOUSE ESTATE COMPANY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Allow me to suggest, that neither your own comments on the case of Suffield v. Brown, nor those of your correspondent, C. E. F. N., give sufficient prominence to what is most significant and remarkable in the Lord Chancellor's judgment—a judgment which filled with astonishment those who were more familiar with the law of easements than with his Lordship's judicial habits. The following extracts, from the very learned and accurate Treatise on Easements, by Mr. Gale, and from some of the leading cases, will shew what, when that judgment was delivered, was, and still is, settled law:—

Speaking of easements, commonly called of necessity, which, he observes, it is quite clear are equally implied in favour of both parties, Mr. Gale says:—"It is true that, strictly speaking, a man cannot subject one part of his property to another by an easement, for no man can have an easement in his own property, but he obtains the same object by the exercise of another right—the general right of property; but he has not the less thereby permanently altered the quality of the two parts of his heritage, and if, after the annexation of peculiar qualities, he alien one part of his heritage, it seems but reasonable, if the alterations thus made are palpable and manifest, and in their nature permanent changes, in the disposition of the property, so that one part thereby becomes dependant upon another, that a purchaser takes the land, burthened or benefited, as the case may be, by the qualities which the previous owner had undoubtedly the right to attach to it. This reasoning applies to those easements only which are attended by some alteration which is in its nature obvious and permanent, or, in technical language, to those easements only which are apparent and continuous, understanding by apparent signs not only those which must necessarily be seen, but those may be seen or known on a careful inspection by a person ordinarily conversant with the subject." (Gale on Easements, 3rd ed., by W. H. Willea, p. 85).

Accordingly, in Pyer v. Carter (1 H. & Norm. 922), the doctrine was applied to a drain, which might have been discovered upon such examination of the property as is usually made by a careful purchaser; and the Court (not in any way referring to or relying on the French rule as to a destination du père de famille), said—"It seems in accordance with reason, when the owner of two or more adjoining houses sells and conveys one of the houses to a purchaser, that such house in his hands should be entitled to the benefit of all the drains from his house, and subject to all the drains then necessarily used for the enjoyment of the adjoining houses, and that, without express reservation or grant, inasmuch as he purchases the house such as it is. If that were not so, the inconveniences and nuisances in towns would be very great." The Court then shewed, by reference to the cases of Nicholas v. Chamberlayne (Cro. Jac. 121); Shury v. Pigott (Poph. 166); and Coppy v. J. de B. (11 Hen. 7, 25, pl. 6), that this is old and well-settled law. The distinction for this purpose between discontinuous easements, such as a right of way not connected with the structure of the tenement, or the right claimed in the case before the Lord Chancellor, and continuous easements, such as drains, lights, &c., was recognised in Worthington v. Gimson (29 L. J., Q. B., 116). Even a right of way, if necessary for the enjoyment of either of the severed tenements, according to its construction at the time of severance, will be reserved by implication to the grantor, or pass to the grantee, as the case may be. "The lease did not grant the right in terms, and the only way in which it could grant it was, that the condition of the premises, at the time when the lease was granted, shewed that it was intended that the right of way should be exercised upon the principle of law I have adverted to—that by the devolution of the tenements originally held in one ownership, a right of way to a particular door or gate would, as an apparent and continuous easement, pass to the owners and occupiers of both of them." (Per Bramwell, B., Glave v. Harding, 27 L. J., Exch., 292). So, the purchaser of land adjoining to a house retained by the vendor cannot block up any of the lights in the house, although they are recent. (Compton v. Richards, 1 Price, 27, and Rivière v. Bower, 1 Ry. & M. 24). See Hinchliffe v. Kinnoul (5 Bing. N. C. 22), and also the cases cited in the editorial article of Feb. 27.

Such being the settled law, as old as the Year Books, and as recent in application as the last year or two, how does the Lord Chancellor refer to it?—the claim before him, be it remembered, being for a discontinuous non-apparent easement, not in any way affecting or indicated by the structure of the tenement in respect of which it was claimed. His Lordship, properly enough, decides that the claim cannot be sustained; and, overruling the decision of the Master of the Rolls, characterises the doctrine involved in it as "serious and alarming." "But," he adds, "I believe it to be of very recent introduction." It had never been introduced, or existed at all, save in the decision of the Master of the Rolls. And then he proceeds to ridicule the learned and perfectly accurate exposition of the law contained in Mr. Gale's book, and describes the judgment in Pyer v. Carter as fallacious and erroneous; and says, "I cannot look upon the case as rightly decided, and must wholly refuse to accept it as any authority." By which his Lordship evidently meant, that the case was in point, but that he would not follow it—the fact being, that the case had nothing to do with the question before him.

Now, I need not say a word more in defence of Pyer v. Carter; the principle involved in it is too deeply founded in convenience and common sense, and too well settled to be shaken by an obiter dictum of Lord Westbury. But what is to be thought or said of a judge who, in his eagerness for notoriety, will thus rashly and arrogantly set his hasty misconceptions above the well-considered decisions of able judges and the deliberate conclusions of cautious and learned text-writers?

The case of Izenberg v. The East India House Estate Company (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 221), however, contains doctrine which may well be described as "serious and alarming"—at least, to all but the overworked members of committees on private bills. It amounts to this—that any one may, without the aid of the Legislature, force his neighbour to sell his lights or other easements, if he can only manage to anticipate the interference of a court of equity, by running up against them a building of greater value than the damage occasioned by it! Classified Synopsis of Bankruptcy Proceedings in the County Courts; with the Sections of the Acts, the Rules, the Official Instructions, and the Forms arranged in consecutive Order as required in Practice; forming a simple Practical Guide to the Law and Practice of Bankruptcy in the County Courts. By BENJAMIN PAGE GRIMSEY, Deputy Registrar of the County Court of Suffolk, at Ipswich.

[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes; Alfred Piper, Ipswich. 1864.]

MR. GRIMSEY'S classified Synopsis of Bankruptcy Proceedings in the County Courts, is a work which will be of great use to those who practise in those courts.

The confusion occasioned both by the language and arrangement of the clauses in the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is notorious, and it is attributable, perhaps, as much to the non-completion of a more extended and matured consolidation scheme, as to the amendments of Parliament, or the faults of the draftsmen. In order to work the act, there have been added general orders, supplemental orders, and instructions written at different times and in divers manners, the whole effect of which may be described as being chaotic rather than clear.

Mr. Grimsey, in his Synopsis has succinctly methodised the acts, rules, and official instructions, so that they may be readily used and quoted in the county courts; and by so doing he will save practitioners much trouble, and prevent their making many mistakes.

The Law Lexicon, or Dictionary of Jurisprudence, explaining the technical Words and Phrases employed in the several Departments of English Law; including the various Legal Terms used in Commercial Business; together with an explanatory as well as literal Translation of the Latin Maxims contained in the Writings of the Ancient and Modern Commentators. By J. J. S. WHARTON, Esq., M.A., Oxon, Barrister-at-Law, Author of "The Articled Clerks' Manual." Third Edition.
[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes. 1864.]

No law library is complete without a law dictionary or law lexicon. To the practitioner, it is always useful to have at hand a book where in a small compass he can find an explanation of terms of infrequent occurrence, or obtain a reference to statutes on most subjects, or to books wherein particular subjects are treated of at full length.

To the student, it is almost indispensable in his daily reading and study that he should have beside him a book which will give him in clear and concise language the meaning of terms of art, which, in some treatises are but imperfectly explained, or are not explained at all, in consequence of authors assuming a knowledge on the part of their readers which does not exist.

Mr. Wharton's Law Lexicon, the third edition of which has just been published, and in the preparation of which he has been assisted by G. H. Cooper, Esq., of the Inner Temple, and R. Searle, Esq., of the Middle Temple, can, in our opinion, be highly recommended both to practitioners and students, as containing a mass of information upon law and legal terminology, and upon a great variety of subjects connected more or less intimately with the vast and still increasing field of jurisprudence.

There is also a large collection of legal maxims in Mr. Wharton's book, sometimes accompanied by illustrations, and always by translations for the benefit of those who are not adepts in what are termed the learned languages.

Among the terms and phrases are to be found not only those which appear in our books of black letter law, but also those which have been invented to supply the exigencies of modern developments and those which relate to civil, mercantile, and international jurisprudence, and to the Hindoo and Mussulman juridical systems, as administered in our Indian empire.

Several useful additions have been made to the present edition, the text has been carefully revised, and the alterations made in the law since the second edition, have been carefully noted.

Mr. Wharton's Lexicon, in fine, is not only of great utility to the practitioner and student in the legal profession, but it will be a most valuable addition to the library of the general reader.

COMMISSIONER TO ADMINISTER OATHS IN CHANCERY.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Harry Tilly, Gent., of Falmouth, Cornwall, to be a Commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

The Right Hon. Sir William Erle, Knt., Lord Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, has appointed John Peed, Gent., of Whittlesey, in the county of Cambridge, to be one of the Perpetual Commissioners for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women, in and for the county of Cambridge.

GENERAL EXAMINATION.—TRINITY TERM, 1864.

THE Council of Legal Education have approved of the following rules for the public examination of the students.

The attention of the students is requested to the following rules of the Inns of Court:—

"As an inducement to students to propose themselves for such examination, studentships and exhibitions shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each, and twenty-five guineas per annum each respectively, to continue for a period of three years, and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each general examination; and one such exhibition shall be conferred on the student who obtains the second position; and further, the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations; and the Inns of Court to which such students as aforesaid belong, may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students previously to their being called to the Bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship, exhibition, or certificate, unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students has been such as entitles them thereto."

"At every call to the Bar those students who have passed a general examination, and either obtained a studentship, an exhibition at such examination, or a certificate of honour, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day."

RULES FOR THE PUBLIC EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR HONOURS, OR CERTIFICATES ENTITLING STUDENTS TO BE CALLED TO THE BAR.

An examination will be held in next Trinity Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship, an exhibition, or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the Bar, will be admissible.

Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the treasurer's office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs on or before Thursday, the 12th day of May next; and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship or other honourable distinction, or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the Bar.

The examination will commence on Thursday, the 19th day of May next, and will be continued on the Friday and Saturday following.

It will take place in the Hall of Lincoln's Inn; and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Thursday morning, the 19th May, at half-past nine, on Constitutional Law and Legal History; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on Equity.

Friday morning, the 20th May, at half-past nine, on Common Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on the Law of Real Property, &c.

Saturday morning, the 21st May, at half-past nine, on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, a paper will be given to the students including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on Saturday afternoon there will be no oral examination.

The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of that examination will vary, according as the student is a candidate for honours or a studentship, or desires simply to obtain a certificate.

The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below mentioned, regard being had, however, to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination.

In determining the question whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the Bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations until he shall have obtained a certificate.

Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination as a candidate for the studentship or exhibition, but only at the general examination immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate; provided, that if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship or exhibition, his name shall not appear in the list.

Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship or the exhibition.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, March 11.

On the motion of Lord Malmesbury, the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill was read a first time. The Turnpike Roads Bill was read a second time.

Monday, March 14.

The Inclosure Bill was read a second time.

Tuesday, March 15.

The Lord Chancellor said that, as the Insane Prisoners' Bill had been the subject of a good deal of discussion, the Government thought the best mode of dealing with it in that House was to refer it to a select committee.

The bill was then ordered to be referred to a select committee.

Wednesday, March 16.

The Inclosure Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, March 10.

Mr. A. Mills asked the First Commissioner of Works whether it was intended to introduce any measure during the present session for the concentration of the courts of justice; and whether his attention had been called to the serious depreciation of property on the site recommended by the Commissioners of 1858, in consequence of the uncertainty which had prevailed during the last three years as to the intentions of the Government on this subject.

Mr. Cowper said he trusted he should be able to give a full explanation of the whole matter in a short time.

Mr. H. Seymour asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it was the intention of her Majesty's Government, during the present session, to introduce measures for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries in England, which were promised last session. Bills had been promised last year, but week after week had passed without any bills being introduced, and it was said that there were great difficulties in the way, in consequence of the impossibility of getting the prelates to agree. If they waited for that, they would have to wait a long time, and he hoped the Government would introduce measures at once on their own responsibility, to remedy the evils which had long ago been proved to exist.

Sir G. Grey said he had not given any actual promise on the subject last session, but he had said that bills were in preparation, and, indeed, were shortly afterwards prepared. He quite agreed that it would be wrong of the Government to abstain from bringing in a bill until all the prelates were agreed, but last year the Lord Chancellor had a meeting, at which several of the prelates were present, to endeavour to ascertain what amount of support the Clergy Discipline Bill was likely to obtain, and he was satisfied then that there would be great difficulty in passing the bill which he had then prepared; nor did he entertain any sanguine hope that he should be able to pass a bill this year. With regard to the Courts and Registries, about which there was not the same difference of opinion, he had communicated with the Lord Chancellor, and, without giving any positive promise, he might say that the Government hoped to be able to introduce bills this session.

Monday, March 14.

Mr. Doulton gave notice, that after Easter he would call attention to the practice of exercising the Royal prerogative of mercy, and move a resolution, that the advice tendered to the Crown, in reference to a remission of the capital punishment, should be based on a solemn inquiry rather than upon individual responsibility.

In reply to Sir J. Hay, Sir G. Grey said that the papers on the subject of the West Riding assize had already been laid on the table.

Sir S. Northcote asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was the case, that a notice was put up in every convict prison to the effect, that convicts under sentences for life might be eligible to have their cases considered, with a view to a remission of their sentences, after a period of from eight to twelve years; whether persons who, having been sentenced to death, had had that sentence commuted into a sentence of transportation or penal servitude for life, were held to be entitled to the same consideration as convicts originally sentenced to punishment for life; and whether he would have any objection to lay upon the table a return of the cases in which convicts whose sentences had been so commuted had subsequently been liberated.

Sir G. Grey said, that no notice such as that to which the honourable gentleman referred in the first part of his question was now put up in the convict prisons. The notice now used was merely an explanation that all convicts under long sentences were exempted from the general rules as to remission. Each case was to be considered on its own merits, and no time was fixed when a convict would be entitled to claim remission. The practice under the old system had probably led the honourable baronet into a misapprehension as to what was now done. There was a rule that no convict under a long sentence should be sent abroad until he had undergone eight years of his sentence in this country. As to the second question, it was very difficult to reply to it within the limits of an ordinary answer, and he hoped he might have an opportunity of explaining the matter more fully on some other occasion. He could only say briefly, that no difference was made in the regulations between the two classes of convicts referred to—those who, having been sentenced to death, had had that sentence commuted to penal servitude for life, and those on whom the latter sentence had been passed in the first instance. Practically, however, a distinction was made between them. As to the return asked for, there would be no objection to granting it if it were limited as to time; and if the honourable baronet would communicate with him privately, that could be arranged.

Tuesday, March 15.

Mr. W. Ewart gave notice, that in this month he would submit a motion to the House for the repeal of the punishment of death.

Leave was given to Mr. Baines to bring in a bill to extend the franchise in boroughs, by reducing the qualification from 10*l.* to 8*l.*

Leave was given to Mr. Agar Ellis to bring in a bill to amend the laws which relate to the registration of Parliamentary voters in counties in Ireland.

Wednesday, March 16.

Mr. Hadfield, in moving the second reading of the Judgment, &c., Law Amendment Bill, stated that its object was to give additional facilities to the owners of freehold property in transferring the same.

Sir G. Grey did not object to the second reading, but he hoped the bill would be referred to a select committee.

After a few words from Mr. Scully, the bill was read a second time.

Mr. Hunt moved the second reading of the Election Petitions Bill.

Sir G. Grey said a bill similar to this had been introduced last year, and referred to a select committee. The bill, however, as now introduced, was considerably different from the shape in which it emerged from that committee, and its details would require great consideration. He should, however, not oppose the second reading.

Sir F. Goldsmid objected to the great principle of the bill—that which compelled a petitioner in all cases to proceed with his petition—and intimated that he would move the rejection of the bill on going into committee.

After some remarks from Mr. Collins, the bill was read a second time.

EQUITY AND LAW LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.—

This society held its annual general meeting on Thursday, the 25th February, at the society's house, No. 18, Lincoln's-inn-fields. George Lake Russell, Esq., in the chair. The report of the directors was read, from which it appears that the past year, the nineteenth of the society's existence, has been an unusually prosperous one; and has been marked by a greater progress in various respects than it has hitherto fallen to the lot of the directors to report. In the course of the year 151 policies were issued, under which were insured capital sums of 238,350*l.*, and one reversionary annuity of 225*l.* The premiums received in respect of these policies amounted to 9099*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*; but it should be mentioned that in this sum is included a larger amount than usual of single premiums, viz. 1951*l.* 10*s.* 5*d.* Both the sum insured by the new policies and the premiums received thereon are considerably in excess of those of any previous year. The total income of the year was 78,595*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.*, and the outgoings of every description amounted to 32,730*l.* 17*s.* The difference, 45,864*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* (or nearly 58*l.* per cent. of the total income), was added to the assets, which amounted on the 31st December to 396,644*l.* 16*s.* The increase of the assets in the last four years has been 140,761*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.* The society continues to experience the same remarkable immunity from heavy claims as has been noticed in former reports. Ten deaths have occurred among the lives insured, and claims to the amount of 11,547*l.* 10*s.* have arisen in consequence under twenty-six policies. Six only of these policies, insuring 7800*l.*, were effected on the participating scale of premiums, and the bonuses attaching to them amount to 537*l.* 10*s.* The remaining twenty policies, insuring 3210*l.*, were not entitled to bonus. The average rate of interest realised on the investments still continues to increase. The interest received in the course of last year was 15,267*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, being at the rate of 4*l.* 16*s.* per 100*l.* on the assets at the beginning of the year, exclusive of reversions purchased. A profit has also accrued by the falling in of two reversions, which profit will appear in the statement of accounts for 1864. The number of policies in force on the 31st December last was 1650, insuring the sum of 1,996,623*l.* The following are the directors who retire by rotation:—Mr. Hughes, Mr. Bristowe, Mr. Potter, and Mr. Armstrong. The directors regret to have to announce that a vacancy has also occurred through the death of Mr. Lucas, a gentleman who was connected with the society from its commencement. The retiring auditors are Mr. Boodle for the proprietors, and Mr. Bailey for the assured. In conclusion, the directors have to remind the proprietors that a declaration of profits will take place after the close of the current year; and would urge them to use their endeavours to maintain the high position which the society has attained, and to render the closing year of the current quinquennial period still more prosperous than the year now under review. The directors confidently claim the support of the proprietors and the public for the society, on the grounds of the liberality and fairness of its conditions, the complete security it offers to the assured, and above all, the very large bonuses attaching to its policies. The moderate amount of the expenses, which are now under 5*l.* per cent. of the income, and bear each year a less ratio to it—the high rate of interest realised on the investments—and the very favourable mortality experienced over a long series of years, leave no room to doubt that the future profits of the society will be at least as large, in proportion to the increasing income, as those declared on former occasions. It will further be remembered that the assured are entitled to nine-tenths of the whole of the profits; but a large proportion of the business of the society consists of policies which do not participate in the profits, and much more than one-tenth of the whole profits is derived from such policies; so that the assured in this society have greater advantages than if they formed a mutual insurance company, dividing among themselves the whole of the profits arising from their own policies.

THE ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY has much satisfaction in announcing to the public that the effort which was made (so far as its proprietors were concerned) by only one individual holding fifteen shares, to restrain its recent liberality on accession of the late fearful explosion at Liverpool, has entirely and completely failed, the Vice-Chancellor declaring, that as the plaintiff did not come into court for the benefit of the Company, the bill must be dismissed with costs.

The course pursued by this Office received in three days the approval of Proprietors holding nearly 40,000 shares, irrespective of upwards of 20,000 held by the Directors themselves, making a total of 60,000 out of 91,000 issued. It is therefore evident that the vast majority, if not almost all, without exception, of the holders of the remaining 34,000 shares would have signified a like acquiescence, if time had afforded opportunity for the act.

The public may now, therefore, be assured of the continuance of the same principle of liberality which has ever distinguished this Office, supported as it is by the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, and backed by the prompt and cordial acquiescence of its Shareholders.

The Royal Insurance Company thankfully acknowledges the generous assistance given in the shape of affidavits from the representatives of the Sun, Phoenix, Royal Exchange, and Alliance, attesting their concurrence in the course taken by the Royal in the ex gratia payment of the losses sustained, these great Companies having themselves acted in the like liberal spirit.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 26, 1864.

IN last Michaelmas Term an important step in the reform of legal education was taken by the "Consolidated Regulations of the several Societies of Lincoln's Inn, the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, and Gray's Inn (hereinafter described as the four Inns of Court), as to the admission of students, the mode of keeping terms, the calling of students to the Bar, the granting certificates to practise under the Bar, and legal education." This document, which will be found at length, ante, p. 16, consists of fifty regulations, which are distributed under the following heads:—

Admission of Students.
Keeping Terms.
Calling to the Bar.
Council of Legal Education.
Educational Terms.
Readers.
Emoluments of Readers.
Fees payable by Students.
Examinations on Subjects of Lectures.
General Examinations.
Common Fund.
Commencement.

The above regulations were sanctioned and confirmed by orders of the several Societies, as under-mentioned:—

Middle Temple, 18th December, 1863.
Gray's Inn, 18th December, 1863.
Lincoln's Inn, 22nd December, 1863.
Inner Temple, 22nd December, 1863.

Many of these regulations are re-enactments of others previously in force; but some of them are new; and we propose to direct attention to the most remarkable of the latter, namely, those which relate to the examination of students previous to their admission.

On this subject the regulations provide as follows:—

"1. Every person who shall have passed a public examination at any of the Universities within the British dominions, shall be entitled to be admitted as a student to any Inn of Court, for the purpose of being called to the Bar, or of practising under the Bar, without passing a preliminary examination, &c.

"2. Every other person applying to be admitted as a student to any Inn of Court, for the purpose of being called to the Bar, or of practising under the Bar, shall, before such admission, have satisfactorily passed an examination in the following subjects, viz:—

(a). The English and Latin Languages.

(b). English History.

"3. Such examination shall be conducted by a joint board, to be appointed by the four Inns of Court.

"4. For constituting such board, each Inn shall appoint six examiners.

"5. The examiners shall attend according to a rota to be fixed by themselves, and that two shall be a quorum.

"6. Meetings of the examiners of students, applying for admission at any of the four Inns of Court, shall be held at least once in every week between the 20th October and the 10th August in each year."

In pursuance of these regulations meetings were held by the examiners appointed under them, who made, among others, the following additional rules for their own guidance:—

"7. Two examiners shall conduct each examination, of whom one shall always be present, and both shall be present at any viva voce examination; and they shall enter their names and the date of the examination in a book to be kept for the purpose.

"8. The certificates shall be granted and signed by the two examiners who shall have conducted the examination; and any other examiners who may have been present shall not decide on the merits of the candidates, &c.

"9. There shall be an examination on paper in all cases, and a viva voce examination at the discretion of the examiners.

"10. The examination in the Latin language shall consist of translations from one or more classic authors.

"12. It shall be lawful for any examiner to appoint a substitute for himself from the Board of Examiners, for the purpose of conducting an examination."

Whether students should or should not be examined previous to being called to the Bar, is a question on which great difference of opinion prevails. The examination that exists at present is voluntary, not compulsory. By regulation 15, "No student shall be eligible to be called to the Bar who shall not have attended during one whole year the lectures and private classes of two of the readers, or have been a pupil during one whole year, or periods equal to one whole year, in the chambers of some barrister, certified special pleader, conveyancer, or draftsman in equity, or two or more of such persons, or have satisfactorily passed a general examination."

Those who are in favour of rendering this examination compulsory argue, that it is but reasonable to require of every person seeking admission into any profession, business, or trade, to shew that he is qualified for its exercise; that this is an act of justice, not merely to himself or others, but to the community at large, who are expected to intrust their interests to his care. That such an examination is required in the other learned professions, as also for the army, navy, and many Government and public offices; and, lastly, that in olden times there was such an examination for the Bar, either directly or in the shape of public moots or disputations, the form of which was, until recently, preserved in our Inns of Court, although the reality had long disappeared.

On the other hand it is urged, that the Bar of this country has at all times so well discharged its duty to the community that innovations on the existing system are to be deprecated. That the guarantee against ignorant or incompetent persons setting up to practise that profession is the ill success that is sure to attend them: an argument which would be entitled to great weight, if the barrister's ignorance of his profession worked injury to himself alone, and did not require the sacrifice of the property, character, or perhaps lives, of several clients before that ignorance is exposed. Moreover, it is a fallacy to assume that all persons who are called to the Bar intend to make it a profession. Many come to it in order to obtain a social position, to which they otherwise are not entitled; and some even for the purpose of settling in the country, where the title of barrister gives them a claim to respect, and perhaps even to precedence at quarter sessions and elsewhere, to which they have in reality no claim in virtue of any acquaintance with the law; and the allowing that title to be taken for such purposes is very like passing off a false coin on society.

Be this as it may, the voluntary examination of persons seeking to be called to the Bar has been in force for some years; but the regulations before us introduce another and different state of things, namely, the compulsory examination of persons seeking to become students of the law. Many of the arguments used for and against examination for the Bar may be used for and against this. For our own part, we cannot help thinking, that whether a preliminary examination of students is advisable or not depends much on the subjects to which it extends, and the manner in which it is conducted. If that examination embraced a large number of sciences or languages, or required any high degree of scholarship to pass it, we should be disposed to look on it as injurious. But it is limited to three subjects, namely—1. The English language. 2. The Latin language. 3. English history; and he must be a bold man who asserts that a reasonable knowledge of these is not indispensable, not merely to a professor of the higher branch of the legal profession, but even to the ordinary education of a gentleman. Still it is obvious, that an examination in any of them, the Latin language especially, might be so conducted as to exact from the candidate an amount of scholarship far beyond what is usual or necessary, and many desirable candidates for the profession of the law might be rejected in consequence. This is a matter of some importance; for we believe that the examiners are not quite agreed in their views, as to the amount of scholarship that ought to be exacted from the candidates; and we, therefore, wish that the Benchers, by whom the regulations were drawn up, had been more explicit on the subject. So with respect to the examination in the English language. Acquaintance with a language consists of two things—knowledge of its grammar, and correctness in pronouncing it. Now, we cannot suppose for a moment, that the framers of these rules intended, that persons who understand the English language grammatically were to be rejected as students for the Bar on the ground of provincial or peculiar accent;—such a rule would disqualify almost every candidate from the sister kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as well as not a few from England itself; and it is well known that many persons have attained, and justly attained, the highest honours and distinction in the profession of the English law, whose pronunciation of the English language was very incorrect. We believe, that on this subject also, the examiners do not all hold the same views; and we trust that if the regulations before us are ever revised, it will not be overlooked. Even in the Latin examination the same difficulty might present itself; for although, being a dead language, its true pronunciation is lost, so that scarcely any two nations in Europe pronounce it alike, yet it is just possible that a pragmatic examiner might, in blind admiration of the English mode of pronunciation, reject a candidate who understood the language of ancient Rome far better than himself, merely because he pronounced it according to the French or German mode.

The examination of students previous to admission is not altogether new. Such an examination existed previously at the Inner Temple, in consequence of a resolution of the Benchers, passed about thirty-five years ago. Under that system, however, the examination was strictly private, the examiner and candidate being in a room alone; so that there was no check whatever on the examiner, who, if corrupt or prejudiced, might exclude the candidate from entering the profession of the law, on the pretence that his classical knowledge was deficient; thus not only destroying his prospects, but libelling his reputation as a scholar. We do not in the least mean to assert that anything of this kind ever took place, but the possibility of its occurrence is too obvious to be overlooked. Under the new regulations, as stated above, the examination must be conducted by two examiners, and by the rule established by the examiners, all the rest, though not on duty on the occasion, have a right to be present, and take part in it. Still we think it would be an improvement if the rejected candidate had a right of appeal to the Benchers of the Inn of Court of which he seeks to become a member, against his rejection by the examiners. This would be a powerful check on them, while, if a really unqualified person were to appeal against their decision, its correctness would be affirmed, and his ignorance and presumption be rendered more thoroughly conspicuous.

THE arguments of counsel and judgments of the several barons in the case of The Alexandra run to such a length, that we think we may be doing a service to those of our readers who have not time or inclination to wade through them, if we give a short account of the case, and of the grounds upon which the Court of Exchequer was equally divided in opinion on the construction to be put upon the Foreign Enlistment Act, 59 Geo. 3, c. 69. For a description of the vessel, of her build, and of the equipments which gave rise to her seizure, we will refer to "The Jurist" of the 12th March; from which it will appear, that she was in an unfinished state, and that although some of these equipments were capable of being used for purposes of war, there was no evidence that she was intended to be so completely fitted up and equipped in a port of this country, that she could, immediately on leaving such port, be used as a vessel of war. Now, the 7th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act makes it a misdemeanour in any person in any part of the United Kingdom, or in any part of his Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, without the leave and license of his Majesty, "to equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, or attempt or endeavour to equip, furnish, fit out, or arm, or knowingly to aid or assist &c., with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, state, &c., or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities against any prince, state, or potentate, &c., with whom his Majesty shall not be at war."

The question turned upon the meaning of the words "equip, furnish, and fit out." At the trial, the Chief Baron told the jury that, in his opinion, these words meant the same thing; and, in effect, he directed them, that unless they were of opinion that the intention was completely to equip the vessel at Liverpool, so that she could leave that port in a condition to act aggressively, they must find a verdict for the claimants.

This was the contention of the claimants' counsel on the argument of the rule for a new trial, viz. that the case of The Alexandra was not within the 7th section, unless the jury was satisfied that the intention was so to equip and furnish her, that she could act as a vessel of war as soon as she left the port of Liverpool; whereas the counsel for the Crown argued, that whatever the nature of the equipments, and however unfit the vessel might be at the time she left the port to be used as a vessel of war, still, if the intent was so to use her at any future time, the case was within the section. As will be seen from the report of the case, the Chief Baron and Bramwell, B., adopted the view of the counsel for the claimants, and Channell and Pigott, BB., that of the counsel for the Crown. The Chief Baron considered, in his most able judgment, that neither the act nor the intention was so much considered by the framers of the statute as the place; that it was a British port here or abroad that was made sacred, and that the main object was to prevent the ports of this country from being made ports of hostile equipment against a friendly belligerent; that there was no direct evidence that the persons equipping The Alexandra had any intention to cruise or commit hostilities at all. "I am of opinion" (he says), "that the 7th section should be construed as if the words were—'if any person' (in the places mentioned) 'shall, without the leave, &c., equip,' as a means, 'any ship or vessel,' to the end, 'that such ship or vessel shall cruise or commit hostilities;' and then, if after all the equipping, or furnishing, or fitting out, the ship is incapable of cruising or committing hostilities, there has been no such equipment as the statute was intended to prevent. In my judgment, the act was not framed in order to make any difference between ships of war and guns, ammunition, and other implements, but to prevent our shores from being made the points of departure of hostile expeditions, commissioned and equipped to commit hostilities against a belligerent not at war with us."

Baron Bramwell put the point very concisely in his judgment—"What is the meaning of the words, 'with intent or in order that such ship shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, with the intent to cruise or commit hostilities?' Does the expression mean, 'with intent or in order that by means of such equipment she may cruise or commit hostilities; that she shall be in a condition for proximate hostilities, so that the port she leaves will be a station of hostilities?' Or does it mean, as contended by the Crown, that an intent is within the statute, where the equipment is in order that she may be employed in the service of a foreign prince, though further acts on his part are necessary to enable her to commit hostilities. I think this is a correct statement of the question, and that it must be answered adversely to the Crown's contention. I think that the fair and natural meaning of the words is, that the equipment must be fit for cruising or the commission of hostilities. The word 'intent' before 'to cruise or commit hostilities,' seems put there on purpose to shew this. I think the section prohibits that equipment only which is itself such that by means of it the vessel can commit hostilities, and that no equipment which gives no means of attack or defence is within sect. 7. I believe it was intended to evade, not to infringe, the statute. I see no evidence that it was intended to arm or equip her in the Queen's dominions so as to be capable of attack or defence."

Such were the opinions of the Chief Baron and Bramwell, B. On the other hand, Channell and Pigott, BB., considered that an equipment might be within sect. 7, although not so complete in this country that the ship should be at once able to commit hostilities; and they appear to adopt the contention of the Attorney-General, that any equipment, however peaceful in its nature, will be an offence against the act, provided there is an intent that the vessel shall be used at some future time in the service of a belligerent. Where the equipment is clearly peaceful, there will be much greater difficulty in proving the intent; but assuming the intent to be proved, any kind of equipment will be within the section. Suppose a jury to find, as a matter of fact, that a certain vessel is intended to be sent to the West Indies, and then to have guns put on board; that when the guns are on board, the mainsail with which she has been equipped in Liverpool may assist her in chasing an enemy's vessel, they may be justified in deducing from that fact that the mainsail is an equipment in order that she may be employed to cruise. Baron Channell thus expresses himself:—"I agree with the Chief Baron and Bramwell, B., in thinking that what this statute forbids is an equipment for war. I agree with them in thinking that the main object of the statute was to prevent our ports being made stations of hostilities. Our difference appears to be this—that they think the equipment must be intended to be completed, so that the vessel when it leaves our port shall be in a condition at once to commit hostilities; while it seems to me, that in the fair and reasonable meaning of the words used, another case is included, viz. where the equipment, not being complete to that extent, is yet capable of being used for war, and the intent is clear that it is to be used for war." This sentence expresses clearly the difference of opinion which divided the Court. It will be unfortunate if the House of Lords should agree with the Exchequer Chamber in holding that there is no appeal, as it is high time that this unhappy section should be judicially construed by the supreme court of appeal, and, if necessary, that further legislation should take place. At present our impression is, that the Chief Baron and Bramwell, B., have put the right construction upon the section.

2.—Number and Date of the several Applications which are still pending.

There have been sixty-five applications, and of these forty-six are now pending, the applications in which were lodged on the dates stated in the return.

3.—Number of Applications which have been withdrawn, or not prosecuted with Success.

They are nine in number; the dates of the applications and last proceedings are stated.

4.—Statement of what has been done in respect of the pending Applications.

In one case the advertisement of intended registration has issued.

In fourteen cases the title has been approved, subject to requisitions thereon, which are in the course of being answered.

In fourteen cases the abstracts have been delivered, and the titles are under investigation.

And in seventeen cases the abstracts have not yet been delivered.

5.—The Probate Value of the several Estates the Subjects of the pending Applications.

The ad valorem is payable only on the actual registration being made, and before that period the value of the estates comprised in the several applications is not inquired into or shewn. In some of the cases, however, the value has been mentioned by the parties, and in others, where the last purchase deed had been recent, the amount of the consideration money then paid has been taken therefrom; and on a calculation made from such sources, the probable value of such of the estates comprised in the pending applications as can thus be got at has been found to amount to 1,500,000*l.* and upwards.

There are, besides the estimates comprised in the foregoing valuation, nineteen other cases in which no estimation of the value can be got at.

The extent of the several estates the subjects of the pending applications, so far as the same can be got at, is about 4787 acres, of which a large part is building land.

There are, besides those comprised in that calculation, eleven other cases in which no estimation of the extent can be got at.

6.—The Total Amount of Fees received in respect of all Business done in the Office since the passing of the Act.

The ad valorem fee is payable only on actual registration, the other fees payable to the office are of trifling amount.

These returns are made up to the 1st March, 1864.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR AND THE "AUTHORISED" REPORTS.

In our number for January 23, 1864, we published with the same title as above, the following, which had been for some time going the rounds of the profession:—

"The following dialogue took place in the Lord Chancellor's Court on Wednesday, the 13th instant:—

"Counsel being about to refer to a case of Ex parte Matheson, stated that it was not reported in the authorised reports.

"LORD CHANCELLOR.—I do not know what are the 'authorised' reports.

"Counsel.—I mean the reports which are understood to have the authority of the Court for their accuracy.

"LORD CHANCELLOR.—I know of no such reports. I hope no reporter will ever be under the direction of the judge.

"Counsel then quoted the case from one of the 'irregular' reports."

The language here attributed to the Lord Chancellor is susceptible of several meanings. First, that there is no such thing as a reporter attached to each Court with a fixed salary, and under the direction of the judges of that Court. Secondly, that reporters being under the direction of the judges, whose decisions they report, is not desirable; but, as it is well known that his Lordship is strongly in favour of the establishment of a department of justice, he may have meant that there would be no objection, but rather advantage, in their being under the control of the minister of that department. And here we take the opportunity of mentioning that we understand that the office of reporter of the Courts at New York is a political office, so that the occupant may be deprived of it by the fall of his patrons. We will not vouch for this, but trust to receive information respecting it from the committee on reporting in their forthcoming report.

Be this as it may, the last number of Beavan's Reports, i. e. vol. 32, part 1, published on the 22nd instant, contains the following announcement, inside the title page:—

"THE AUTHORISED REPORTS OF THE ROLLS COURT.

"Notice.—These reports continue, as heretofore, to be published with the express sanction and authority of the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls."

The italics are ours, and we understand that others of the regular reporters intend to make similar announcements in their next numbers.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

A Bill to amend the Law relating to future Judgments, Statutes, and Recognisances.

(Prepared and brought in by Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Locke King, and Mr. Powell.)

Whereas it is desirable to assimilate the law affecting freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to that affecting purely personal estates in respect of future judgments, statutes, and recognisances, as against purchasers and mortgagees: be it enacted &c.

Sect. 1. No judgment, statute, or recognisance to be entered up after the passing of this act shall affect any land (of whatever tenure), as to a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration or a mortgage, unless at the time of such purchaser or mortgagee acquiring his title such land shall have been actually delivered in execution by virtue of a writ of elegit or other lawful authority, in pursuance of such judgment, statute, or recognisance, or he shall have had notice that such a writ of elegit or other lawful authority shall have been actually delivered to, and remain unexecuted in the hands of, the sheriff, undersheriff, or coroner.

2. In the construction of this act, the term "judgment" shall be taken to include registered decrees, orders of the courts of equity and bankruptcy, and other orders having the operation of a judgment.

3. This act shall not extend to Ireland.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, March 17.

The Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes (Ireland) was read a second time.

Friday, March 18.

The Court of Chancery (Despatch of Business) Bill was read a second time.

The Lord Chancellor, in moving the second reading of the Conveyances, &c. (Ireland) Bill, said it was intended to remedy an evil of the same character which existed in England some years ago, and which had been corrected by legislation. It proposed for the future to subject to control the operations of conveyancers in Ireland, great abuses having grown up from many of them not being connected with any Inn of Court.

The bill was read a second time.

The Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes (Ireland) Bill went through committee.

The Lord Chancellor laid upon the table a bill which had been prepared in accordance with the report of a select committee which sat last session, to give facilities to landowners to assist the construction of railways tending directly to benefit their estates. The noble and learned lord stated, that in the preparation of the measure the model of the Drainage Acts had been followed; and provisions had been added which were specially applicable to the construction of railways.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, March 17.

In reply to Mr. Murray,

Sir G. Grey said, that the Report of the Chancery Fund Commissioners would immediately be circulated.

In reply to Mr. F. Powell,

The Attorney-General was understood to say, that he would introduce a bill for the Consolidation of the Church Building Acts and New Parishes Acts after Easter.

PARLIAMENTARY COUNSEL.—(From The Times).—

The question of the reduction of the fees paid to counsel engaged before parliamentary committees has recently been more than once brought before the House of Commons. In answer to a question put by Colonel W. Patten, Mr. Milner Gibson is reported to have said, that the persons with whom he had consulted on the subject had expressed themselves unwilling to be satisfied, unless the fees paid to parliamentary counsel should be fixed at the same rate as those paid to common law or chancery barristers. A scheme, relating to the reduction of these fees, appears to have been laid before Mr. Milner Gibson by some of the leaders of the parliamentary Bar, but for some reasons obvious to those acquainted with the subject, but not so well known to the general public, the reduction recommended is not so extensive as would appear to be desired by Mr. Milner Gibson's advisers.

There are, however, reasons which I think will be acknowledged to be cogent why the fees taken by parliamentary counsel should be higher than those taken by barristers practising in the other branches of the Profession.

In the first place, a barrister, who devotes himself to parliamentary practice, necessarily gives up all hope of ever attaining any of the high prizes of the Profession. For him there is no Woolsack, no office as Attorney or Solicitor-General, no common law or chancery judgeships in prospect. Nay, further, by choosing that branch of his Profession, he renders himself incapable of entering Parliament at all while continuing to practise. Again: it must be borne in mind that parliamentary counsel have only five months during which to make their income; whereas the other branches of the Profession have between eight and nine. If, therefore, men of good abilities are required to practise before committees, which, considering the importance of public and private interests involved, will hardly be disputed, it would seem that such men cannot be obtained unless the fees given be comparatively high. My excuse for troubling you with this letter is the apparent want of knowledge of the subject on the part of the general public, and the fact that the parliamentary Bar is unrepresented in the House of Commons.

GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. Greenhow, brings into a popular shape, and to the latest date, the entire body of legal regulations affecting the shipping trade of the country alike in relation to owners, merchants, masters, and seamen, and is especially adapted for ordinary use by all persons connected with the business of seaport towns."—Times, Jan. 31, 1863.

"The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 2, 1864.

In our number of the 12th March (ante, p. 84) we inserted, with regret, the report of a scene which took place at the Central Criminal Court between Mr. Commissioner Kerr and Mr. Metcalfe, a barrister practising before him. With increased regret we have now to direct attention to the following:—

"At the Exeter Assizes on Friday, during the hearing of a case, Mr. Carter, a barrister, made an observation which Mr. Baron Bramwell said the learned gentleman had no right to make.

"Mr. Carter.—You have no right to interrupt in this way.

"His LORDSHIP.—I have the right, for you are stating that which is incorrect.

"Mr. Carter.—I have it on my notes.

"His LORDSHIP.—Hear me out, sir. You, sir, know, that the only binding record of what a witness says is what appears on the judge's notes, and I have not got it down.

"Mr. Carter (sharply).—Then you ought to have it down.

"His LORDSHIP.—If you repeat that expression to me I'll send you out of court, sir.

"Mr. Carter.—You are at liberty to do it.

"His LORDSHIP.—Behave yourself decently, or you shall be sent out.

"Mr. Carter.—Your Lordship has no right to address me in this way.

"His LORDSHIP.—I have the right, and shall exercise it, very unpleasantly for you, perhaps.

"Mr. Carter.—You may exercise the power; but I don't know whether you have the right or not. I protest against being interrupted and addressed in this manner.

"His LORDSHIP.—Go on with your address, and conduct yourself properly.

"Mr. Carter then continued his address to the jury."

We are very sorry to observe these "scenes," which are becoming much too frequent. Last year we had occasion to notice a somewhat similar fracas between Mr. Metcalfe and Mr. Payne, the deputy assistant judge, at the Middlesex Sessions (see 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 71); and, if our memory serves us right, a few years ago Mr. Carter had another with Baron Channell, on which occasion some observations were made by him which induced even that amiable and placid judge to declare that Mr. Carter had been "very personal." Our readers will also probably remember the disgraceful affair, at the Middlesex Sessions last year, between Mr. Cooper and Mr. Ribton. (See 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 39).

But a still more recent affair at the Middlesex Sessions seems to have brought this matter to a climax. We feel it an act of justice to all parties, although at some inconvenience to ourselves, to give the report unabridged:—

in a case of larceny, the foreman of the jury remarked, that he thought the learned counsel had no right to insinuate that the witness was not speaking the truth.

"Mr. Pater said it would be better for the foreman not to get into collision with him, and insisted upon his right to cross-examine the witness, with a view of eliciting the truth; and, in his address to the jury, with great emphasis exclaimed, 'I thank God that there is more than one jurymen to determine whether the prisoner stole the property with which he is charged, for if there was only one, and that one was the foreman, from what has transpired to-day, there is no doubt what the result would be.'

"Mr. PAYNE said that was a very improper observation for Mr. Pater to make to the foreman of the jury, and, if he went on in that strain, he should consult the Assistant Judge, in the other court, as to what should be done.

"This sort of thing being continued,

"Mr. PAYNE left the court to consult Mr. Bodkin, and on his return said, 'I have consulted the Assistant Judge in reference to this matter; but it is his opinion, that at this stage it would not be fair to interfere, as it might prejudice the case against the prisoner at the bar; but when it is concluded, we shall then consider what course should be taken as regards Mr. Pater.'

"Mr. Pater said there ought to be a fresh jurymen in the place of the foreman who had acted so improperly.

"Mr. PAYNE.—You are only repeating your former insults.

"Mr. Pater.—And I shall continue to do so till the end of time. Things have arrived at such a pitch that I am bound to resent, and as a great number of the remarks which have fallen from the bench have been applied to me I feel it my duty to speak my mind boldly, and I will always do so, no matter what the result may be. I am intrusted with an important duty, and although the duty of the jury may be more important than mine, yet still mine is an important duty, for you are sworn to return a true and just verdict, and according to the evidence: I have to do a duty according to my conscience and the interest of the client committed to my care, and I thank God I have discharged that duty to the best of my ability, and which I shall continue to do so as long as I have the honour to wear a wig and gown. Notwithstanding the interruption I have received from the foreman of the jury, let us now approach the facts of the case, and see how the evidence points to a conclusion to warrant you in returning a verdict of guilty. My learned friend, Mr. Wood, in opening the case, asked you to return a verdict in favour of the Queen, but the Queen cared very little what result they arrived at, and I do not know why the name of the Queen was introduced unless it was to give extra weight to a case that it did not possess. He then went over the evidence, and called upon the jury to acquit the prisoner.

"Mr. PAYNE summed up the evidence, and the jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to mercy.

"Mr. PAYNE having sentenced the prisoner,

"The Assistant Judge then took his seat upon the bench.

"Mr. PAYNE said—There is a matter connected with this case to which I have felt it to be my duty to draw the attention of the Assistant Judge and the magistrates. Mr. Pater made use of some observations towards the foreman of the jury of a personal character. Those observations were, 'I thank God that there is more than one jurymen to determine whether the prisoner stole the property with which he is charged, for if there was only one, and that one the foreman, from what has transpired to-day there is no doubt what the result would be.' The foreman was in that position, but although he wished some other person to take his place, his brother jurymen considered that to be unnecessary, and he remained. These personal observations were highly unjustifiable on the part of Mr. Pater, and I have thought it right to bring them under the notice of the Assistant Judge. I therefore wish the opinion of the learned Assistant Judge as to what course he would recommend should be taken.

"ASSISTANT JUDGE.—Such things as these are most painful, and tend greatly to embarrass the administration of justice. I trust that Mr. Pater will withdraw the observations.

"Mr. Pater.—Let me first inform your Lordship of a fact that has not been brought to your knowledge, for you were not present when this interruption occurred. The foreman on the previous day interfered in the same unjustifiable manner, and a learned friend of mine took the first opportunity of challenging him, and he was removed from the jury box. I can form no opinion as to his reason for doing so, unless it arose from an inability to control his own temper. I conscientiously stated my opinion, that if there had been but one jurymen to decide the case, an adverse verdict would certainly be returned, and when he interfered by making observations, such conduct was unchecked by Mr. Payne. The foreman said he knew the object of such interruptions by counsel; and, after the observations which fell from the bench, I do not feel warranted in withdrawing the observations, and adopt the course suggested by the Assistant Judge.

"ASSISTANT JUDGE.—This is a gross dereliction of duty, for the use of such language is perfectly unwarrantable. I should recommend Mr. Payne to treat these observations from Mr. Pater as a contempt of court, and, unless they are withdrawn, I should recommend that a fine of 20*l*. be inflicted on him, and returned to the Court of Exchequer, and the Barons of the Exchequer will determine whether the privilege of counsel is to be abused in that way. He hoped it would operate as an example, not much needed, because such conduct was confined to a very few individuals.

"Mr. Pater.—I have acted conscientiously, and I decline to withdraw the observations.

"Mr. Warton.—I wish to say a word. I confirm Mr. Pater in what he has said. The foreman was challenged by me for improper conduct the day before.

"ASSISTANT JUDGE.—To challenge a jurymen is the right of counsel, but it is a very different thing to abuse him.

"Mr. PAYNE.—I saw nothing in the conduct of the foreman to justify the observations made on him.

"Mr. Pater.—I wish to make a few observations.

"Mr. PAYNE.—I must decline to hear you unless you withdraw the observations. Do you do so?

"Mr. Pater.—Certainly not.

"Mr. PAYNE.—Then I fine you 20*l*.

"Mr. Pater.—I can now say that the opinion I have formed of you is concurred in by every member of the bar.

"Mr. Abram.—I do not concur in it.

"Mr. Wood.—Nor I.

"Mr. Pater.—You (Mr. Wood) prosecuted. The matter shall not rest here. I shall bring the subject under the notice of Sir George Grey, and very probably your removal from the bench will be the result.

"In the course of the following morning, at the conclusion of a case, Mr. Pater, addressing Mr. Payne, said he had an application to make to him in reference to a matter which occurred yesterday.

"Mr. PAYNE said, he could not then listen to anything Mr. Pater had to say; but he could renew his application after the adjournment, when the Assistant Judge would be present.

"After the adjournment of the court, on Mr. Payne taking his seat, and several magistrates being on the bench,

"Mr. Pater said—I understand that the court, as now constituted, will hear the application I was about to make before the adjournment.

"Mr. PAYNE.—I have sent for Mr. Bodkin, as he wishes to be present.

"Mr. Pater.—I understood that I was sent for to make my application, and I have an engagement at chambers.

"Mr. H. HARWOOD (a magistrate).—Wait a minute until Mr. Bodkin comes, as he has been sent for.

"The Assistant Judge then entered the court, and took his seat on the bench.

"Mr. PAYNE.—Now, Mr. Pater, I am ready to hear you.

"Mr. Pater.—The application I wished to make before the adjournment of the court, and which I now make, is this—whether the words which are reported, 'I thank God that there is more than one jurymen to determine whether the prisoner stole the property with which he is charged; for if there was only one, and that one the foreman, from what has transpired to-day there is no doubt what the result would be.'—I now ask whether those are the words taken down by the court, and are those the words that are construed into a contempt of court?

"ASSISTANT JUDGE.—It is no use asking such questions. If you have any application to make you had better make it.

"Mr. Pater.—Are those the words that have been taken down?

"ASSISTANT JUDGE.—You have been told yes.

"Mr. Pater.—If those are the words taken down, my application is, that I may have a copy of the notes taken.

"Mr. PAYNE.—The words you have read are the correct words, as I have said before. I acted in the belief that by those words you insinuated that the foreman of the jury was determined to convict the prisoner whether he was guilty or not, and in violation of his oath.

"Mr. Pater.—Then I am clearly to understand that the words taken down are construed into a violation of the foreman's oath. As counsel for the prisoner, I said he had prejudged the case.

"ASSISTANT JUDGE.—This is but a waste of the public time. Do you withdraw the observations or not?

"Mr. Pater.—I never intended to withdraw the words.

"Mr. PAYNE.—The words you have read are correct. Let us have no more of the matter.

"Thus the subject ended, and the regular business of the court proceeded."

We direct attention to these proceedings in the hope that some means will be taken to put a stop to them. It is, perhaps, needless to observe, that when collisions occur between judges and counsel, sometimes the judge is in the wrong, sometimes the counsel is in the wrong, and not unfrequently both are in the wrong. In the first of the instances above given, and also in that which we published on the 12th March, the truth is too obvious to need comment; but we cannot avoid drawing attention to the different modes resorted to by Baron Bramwell on the recent occasion, and by Mr. Commissioner Kerr on the former one, in dealing with a counsel who is, or is supposed to be, insolent and refractory. Baron Bramwell plainly tells the advocate that he shall be sent out of court if he does not conform to order, and uses language intimating that, if necessary, he will commit for contempt. Mr. Commissioner Kerr, on the contrary, proceeds to adjourn the court, i. e. stop the business of the country, put all the suitors to inconvenience, and lock up the jury for the night. Adjourning the court under such circumstances may be a proper course for a revising barrister, or other judge who has no power to commit for contempt; but in a judge who does possess that power, it is highly undignified, and prejudicial to the public interest.

In the remaining and most important of these unfortunate affairs—namely, that which recently occurred at the Middlesex Sessions—we have no hesitation in pronouncing all parties grievously in the wrong, and the whole scene a scandal to the administration of justice. The first fault was committed by the foreman of the jury, who interfered to prevent Mr. Pater from pursuing a course of cross-examination tending to shew that one of the witnesses against his client was speaking falsely. As the nature of the evidence and observations of Mr. Pater are not given, we are unable to pronounce an opinion as to whether he was overstepping his privilege as an advocate or not. But suppose he was, it was for the judge, and not for any jurymen, to call him to order; and if Mr. Payne did as he ought, namely, directed the foreman to keep within his own province of deciding upon the facts, and not invade the province of the court, by taking upon himself to curb irregularities of counsel, the unpleasant scene that followed might have been averted. But instead of this, Mr. Payne takes up the cudgels for the jurymen, and tells Mr. Pater, justly irritated at one of the jury thus giving his verdict before hearing the case out, that his observations were very improper, and calls on him to withdraw them. This Mr. Pater refuses to do, and, for not doing it, is fined. And here it is important to observe, that, although Mr. Pater used a great deal of very strong and utterly indefensible language to Mr. Payne; such as—"The matter shall not rest here. I shall bring the subject under the notice of Sir G. Grey, and very probably your removal from the bench will be the result;" the actual words for which he was adjudged in contempt are these:—"I thank God that there is more than one jurymen to determine whether the prisoner stole the property with which he is charged; for if there was only one, and that one the foreman, from what has transpired to-day there is no doubt what the result would be." We cannot help thinking that in this Mr. Pater received hard measure. The above words may simply have meant, that the individual juror had prejudged the case, and it was, therefore, fortunate that the fate of the accused did not depend on him alone; but suppose they are to be understood as imputing corrupt motives to the juror (whose conduct was unquestionably irregular, and such as to lay him open to observation), is that a contempt of court? Supposing the affirmative, it is surely not so bad as counsel using this language to each other in open court:—"It is a lie. You are a vulgar-minded hound, and a contemptible hound." "That is an unqualified falsehood." "You tell a gross falsehood, and your white face shews that you know it"—language which only last year was passed over by Mr. Bodkin himself, with the intimation that he must stop the altercation, and that he hoped the bar would take the matter up. (See 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, pp. 39, 40).

The power of punishing summarily for contempt of court is one which should be exercised with the greatest possible dignity and caution. That power is an anomaly in itself, for it not only constitutes a man judge in his own cause, but enables him to exercise his jurisdiction assuch, without control, and, in most cases without responsibility; add to which, that it is impossible to define the limits of the power, for contempt may consist not merely in acts or words, but in looks or demeanour. If a party committed for contempt of court sues out a habeas corpus, it is sufficient to return that he is detained for a contempt of a court of competent jurisdiction to commit; although it would be otherwise if the return stated as a contempt that which clearly was not one, unless, perhaps, the words were certified to have been spoken, or the acts done, contemptuously. (See the case of The Sheriff of Middlesex, 11 Ad. & El. 273, and the authorities there collected). And the same principle would probably hold where the punishment is a fine. A little reflection, however, will shew that the existence of this power, enormous and dangerous as it is, is nevertheless indispensable to the due administration of justice; and the moral of the whole is, that those who are intrusted with the patronage of judicial offices should take more care than they sometimes do, to secure ability, discretion, and good temper in those whom they intrust with it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR AND THE AUTHORIZED REPORTS. THE AMERICAN REPORTS.

In our last number, ante, p. 106, after referring to the language said to have been used ex cathedra by the Lord Chancellor, that he knew of no such reports as the "authorized reports," we stated that the number of Beavan's Reports, published on the 22nd March, contains the following inside the title page:—

"THE AUTHORIZED REPORTS OF THE ROLLS COURT."

"Notice.—These reports continue, as heretofore, to be published with the express sanction and authority of the Right Honourable the Master of the Rolls."

Adding, that we understood that others of the regular reporters intended to make similar announcements in their next numbers.

We are now enabled to announce, that since the publication of our last number, this course has been taken in vol. 4, part 2, of Giffard's Reports in Vice-Chancellor Stuart's Court, published on the 30th March.

While upon this subject, we may remark that the tendency of a class among us to laud and exalt the American reports in the lump, to the disparagement of our own, does not appear to be shared by the Americans themselves, or inhabitants of a country very near them. The Canada Law Journal for March, 1864, contains under the head "Law Reporting," an article from the "N. Y. Transcript," from which we extract the following:—

"The task of reporting the decisions of any court is one of more labour, and requiring a higher order of talent, than many would suppose. Almost every lawyer thinks himself competent to perform the work notwithstanding the innumerable failures of other men in the same line. Yet the fact is, that very few have the sound judgment, quick perception, and fine discrimination, which are essential to the success of a reporter. Very few of those who have actually undertaken the task have been fitted for it by nature, and the majority of American reports are not worthy of much commendation. The English reports have been of variable quality, but for the last thirty years have been prepared with faithfulness and ability.

"It would be altogether beyond our command of time or space to review all the trash that has been published in the way of Texas, Alabama, Arkansas, Tennessee, Georgia, and Florida Reports, filled as they are in great part with the maunderings of ignorant judges, compiled by utterly incompetent reporters. Nor can we do more than briefly express our regret at the lowered standard of judicial capacity in some of the Western States, which, in times past, contributed a respectable addition to American law.

"The reports of this State are of very uneven value. Johnson's, Hill's, Denio's, and Paige's Reports are valuable both for their matter and for the style in which they are prepared. Most of the others are valuable only from the fact that they contain the opinions of the Courts, and not from the ability with which they have been compiled. This is especially the case with Wendell's Reports, which are models of slovenly work. Cowen's Reports were prepared with extreme care, and are full of valuable material. The fault which we find with them is in the excessive length of the head-notes, which include every dictum and speculation of the judges, leaving the reader in as much doubt which of the points stated are law, and which are mere illustrations. This defect greatly mars the work. The Court of Appeals reports have erred on the other side, giving only the chief points decided, and wholly omitting to notice the minor rulings of the Court, particularly on questions that are deemed (not always justly) to be settled. Thus, in Forbes v. Waller (25 N. Y. 430) it is expressly ruled that a creditor's action may be maintained on an execution returned in less than sixty days. In Van Alstyne v. Cook (Id. 489) it is adjudged that the omission of the clerk's signature to a judgment roll is an error that may be disregarded. Neither of these rulings is noticed in the head-notes, as we think they should have been, seeing that they are decisions of the Court of last resort on points not previously determined by it, though passed upon by courts below.

"It is desirable that the arguments of counsel should be given in a condensed form—indeed, it is often extremely difficult to understand the opinion of the Court without it. On the other hand, a literal transcript of counsel's briefs is generally a mere imposition upon the patience and pocket of the reader."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 9, 1864.

In these days, when so many great and important undertakings are carried out by means of companies, questions not unfrequently are raised as to the powers of directors to bind by their acts, the other shareholders.

In solving these questions, our Courts are in a great measure guided by those principles which have long been applied to ordinary partnerships.

As a general rule, in ordinary partnerships, one partner can in the absence of contract only bind the other partners by acts which fall within the usual course of their business, nor can he apply the funds or pledge the credit of the partnership for any other purposes.

In like manner, the directors of companies established for one undertaking cannot apply their funds for another. For instance, a company established for granting life and fire insurances cannot engage in marine insurances; and even if all the directors, sanctioned by a large majority of the shareholders, were to do so, their act would be ultra vires, and they might be restrained by the injunction of a court of equity upon the interposition even of a single shareholder. Again: a company established to make a railway and exercise the trade of carriers upon it, from one town to another, cannot add to it the trade of a steam-packet company. It is obvious that if directors were allowed so to apply the funds of companies, they would in numerous instances, of course under colour that they were acting for the benefit of the shareholders, engage in hazardous speculations to which the shareholders never assented when they joined such companies. And there would, moreover, be a temptation to mere speculating adventurers to get up companies for one object, with the original intention kept back from the public, of applying its funds and credit for another.

It is, however, by no means an easy matter always to determine whether certain acts of directors fall within the scope of their powers. This, in a great measure, depends upon the terms of their act of Parliament, deed of settlement, or other instrument establishing the constitution of the company, and the construction to be placed upon them. The Courts, however, seem disposed, where there exists bona fides on the part of directors, and the acts complained of have been done for the purpose of furthering the objects for which the company was established, to place a liberal construction upon the powers given to them.

A recent case of great importance well illustrates the views the Courts adopt on such occasions. The case to which we allude is that of Taunton v. The Royal Insurance Company (10 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 291). There, it appears that the Royal Insurance Company were incorporated as a joint-stock company, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. The deed of settlement declared, that the business or purpose of the company should be (among other things), "to effect insurances on erections of every kind, . . . on goods, wares, merchandise, and on all other personal chattels whatever, against the risk of loss or damage by fire, or by storm or other casualty."

Power was given to the board of directors to adjust and settle losses, pay debts and claims of the company; and there was a power, whenever it was not otherwise provided by the special regulations of the company, that the directors should act in such manner as might appear to them best calculated to promote the interests of the company.

The policies of the company against loss or damage by fire expressly provided, by one of its conditions, that the company "would not be responsible for any loss or damage by explosion, except for such loss or damages as should arise from explosion of gas."

On the 15th January a vessel, called The Lotty Sleigh, having on board a considerable quantity of gunpowder, exploded while in the Mersey, and shattered the glass in the windows of different edifices in Liverpool and Birkenhead, which were insured against loss or damage by fire in the office of the Royal Insurance Company.

The directors, on the following day, resolved to pay any claims which might be made against the company in respect of the damage so caused, whereupon a bill was filed against them by the plaintiff to restrain them from making the payment, as being unauthorised and improper.

It appeared in evidence that the course taken by the directors was approved of by the majority of the shareholders; that most of the payments had been made, but expressly ex gratia, and without admitting any liability on the part of the company; that other companies had followed the example of the Royal Insurance Company; and, moreover, that it was usual for insurance offices to settle such claims, even although they were expressly excepted from the policies. Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief he asked, and, as he had come to the court upon the strict point of law, and not for the benefit of the company, dismissed his bill with costs.

His Honor, in giving judgment, assumed (and he could not have done otherwise) that the policies would not have covered the losses in question.

The losses, however, were such as the directors had, under the deed of settlement, power to grant insurances against. Their doing so, in fact, would not have been ultra vires. The question, therefore, really was, whether or not, where there was a contract, and damage had been done by something decidedly analogous to the risk insured, but which was not strictly within the risk insured, the directors might say, that, for the benefit of the company, having only a few customers who had suffered, it would be desirable, without in any way giving rise to a complaint of dealing harshly with them upon narrow forms, and according to the strict terms of the contract, to pay certain small losses, rather than incur the risk of being damaged in the character of a liberal company, especially, as by so doing, they might not only procure their present, but also obtain other customers in consequence of their liberality. In determining this question, the evidence as to usage was considered by his Honor to be material, because all persons associating themselves together for the purpose of carrying on any trade or business, do so with the intention of carrying on the business according to the usual mode. If, then, in the ordinary course of carrying on insurance companies, it is the practice, for the benefit of the companies, and with the object of extending their business, to pay losses, although the events have not precisely happened on which they are strictly payable, directors having powers to act, in such manner as may appear to them best calculated to promote the interests of a company, may, for such objects, and against the wishes of individual shareholders, make such payments.

The decision of Sir W. P. Wood appears to us to be founded on sound common sense, and to be warranted by the principles laid down by the House of Lords in Simpson v. The Westminster Palace Hotel Company (8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 985). There a joint-stock company, the objects of which were declared by the third clause of the memorandum of association to be "for the purchase of leasehold land in the city of Westminster; the erection, furnishing, and maintenance of an hotel therein; the carrying of the usual business of an hotel and tavern therein; and the doing all such things as were incidental, or otherwise conducive, to the attainment of the above objects." The company bought, and erected an hotel, but before starting their business, let a portion of it as offices to the insurance board for a term of three years, extendible to five, with a stipulation that the company should have the monopoly of supplying the premises occupied by the board with all provisions, wines, and liquors. It was held by the House of Lords, affirming the decision of Sir W. P. Wood, V. C. (8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 764), and of the Court of Appeal, dissentiente Sir G. J. Turner, L. J. (8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 747), that the agreement entered into by the directors was not ultra vires. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Campbell) in giving judgment, said he relied much upon the consideration that the arrangement was temporary, and preliminary and conducive to the ultimate object of the whole building being devoted to the proper business of the hotel. The anticipation expressed by the majority of the shareholders would not be sufficient if the original undertaking were abandoned, or if there were any extension of the original undertaking, but, as there was neither abandonment nor extension of the original undertaking, and the arrangement might assist instead of obstructing the prosecution of the original undertaking, his Lordship thought the decree appealed against ought to be affirmed.

From these cases we may arrive at the conclusion, that where directors of companies do acts, the object of which is in furtherance of the purposes of the association, courts of equity will not, at the instance of individual shareholders, restrain the commission of such acts, although they may not in strict terms be provided for in the articles of association, or the performance thereof is not strictly obligatory upon the directors, by the contracts they have entered into.

These cases are totally distinct from those where directors, acting ultra vires, apply the funds of the shareholders to objects totally distinct from the purposes for which the company was formed. In the latter cases the Courts interpose to protect the capital of the shareholders from being applied to speculations to which they never assented; in the former cases the Courts, with great wisdom, refuse to hamper the action of directors for the benefit of the company in matters within the scope, though not, perhaps, strictly within the letter, of the articles of association. A different course of decision would lead to much litigation, for few companies, however flourishing, are without discontented shareholders, and a discontented shareholder can without difficulty find an enterprising attorney.

It must be matter of observation to any one who has read the reports of causes tried on the several circuits during the present spring assizes, that a large proportion of them have, as soon as the case has been opened, or, during the progress of the trial, been referred to arbitration—a practice which, in the experience of everybody acquainted with the business of the courts, is gradually increasing, and which should, therefore, if improvement is required in it, be improved. Of late years there have been some strong attacks on the system of trial by jury, as being uncertain, unsatisfactory, and capricious, while, on the other hand, the system has been stoutly defended as the best way of doing justice between parties, and as an essential and time-honoured part of our constitution. The fact is, that, as in most questions is the case, both the attack upon, and the defence of, trial by jury, are too sweeping and general. In certain classes of causes a jury is the best tribunal; in others, the worst. And the Legislature, being of this opinion, has extended the powers of judges and parties to compel a reference to arbitration of causes in which numerous items are involved, and accounts have to be investigated which it is not likely that a jury will have time or patience to inquire into. For this reason the provisions as to arbitration in the Common-law Procedure Act, 1854, were enacted, which provisions are most extensively carried out, and have, perhaps, been applied to cases hardly within the intent or language of the statute. The cases within these statutory provisions are generally referred to the Masters of the several courts, and, upon the whole, are not cases in which any very important questions of law are raised, or any large amounts are in dispute. In the latter classes of causes the parties wish to select the arbitrator, as it is not every Master who is considered a satisfactory or agreeable referee, and, therefore, both in these cases and in causes referred at the assizes or the sittings in Westminster or London, the parties select a barrister as the arbitrator. Having thus selected their own tribunal, they can have no good reason for complaining of the result, whatever it may be; but there is a general cause of complaint, which is, no doubt, sound and just, with respect to these references, in which barristers are arbitrators, viz. the great delay which so constantly takes place. Every barrister and attorney knows that it is no unusual thing for an arbitration, in which the matters referred are heavy, and the items and witnesses numerous, to extend over two and sometimes three years, till at last the parties are worn out and sickened by the delay, and make a solemn vow that they will never refer a cause again. There is no doubt that great discredit is cast upon the system of arbitration by this habitual delay. If the counsel attending before the arbitrator are in large practice, the other calls upon their time constantly are in conflict with the appointments of the arbitrator, and it is always, and perhaps too much, considered, that his appointments must give way to court business; they may be postponed while the Courts enforce attendance peremptorily. The arbitrator himself may also, for the same reasons, be prevented from making appointments, or keeping them when made, and is also reluctant, from motives of friendship or courtesy and kindness to the counsel who are attending before him, to enforce attendances which may operate to their inconvenience and to damage them with their other clients. The judges themselves will do all that they can to consult the convenience of counsel, and it is only natural that a barrister should do so in the case of gentlemen who may be his own personal friends. If a weakness, it is a weakness which is excusable, and which at all events is inherent in the system; and yet it ought not to be the case. The interest of the parties should be the first consideration. If a plaintiff is claiming, and is entitled to, a large sum of money, delay may be his ruin. If a defendant is sued for a large sum, he may have a perfectly good defence, and yet the fact of a heavy claim being made against him, and being undetermined, may be his ruin. We apprehend that this delay so much complained of is most certainly a vice in the system of references to barristers. The subject has been one much discussed in the Profession, and one suggestion is that there should be a court of arbitrators, that is, a certain number of judicial arbitrators, among whom causes referred should be allotted, who should take them from day to day till they are ended, and before whom the attendance of counsel should be as compulsory as it is before any other court. An arbitrator so appointed would be relieved from all charge of want of courtesy or of consideration to the convenience of counsel, inasmuch as it would be not the judge, but the law, which enforces their attendance, and the parties could then have no ground for complaining of unnecessary delay. The result might be, that there would be formed an arbitration bar, composed of gentlemen who devoted themselves to this branch of business. Whether or not this would be the case, and whether or not this suggestion of judicial arbitrators is a wise one, still we think the subject deserves, and indeed requires, consideration. There is no doubt that the number of causes referred is on the increase; that there is great delay in arbitrations; and that there is but little hope that delay will cease to be a cause of complaint. Any suggestion, therefore, which draws attention to the subject, and invites the opinions and suggestions of other minds, deserves to be well and seriously weighed.

SUCCESSION DUTY.

Re WALLOP'S TRUSTS.

THE fate of the Succession Duty Act is to be better praised, and to raise more disputes, than any other act in the book. It is the infernal Atée in good apparel. The question discussed, but not decided, in Lovelace's case (5 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 694; 4 De G. & J. 340; see 8 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 507), namely, whether succession duty is payable in respect of a succession created by a settlor domiciled abroad, has been again raised in the recent case of Re Wallop's Trusts (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 328), and is still undecided. The material circumstances of that case were, that a testator, William Wallop, domiciled in England, by his will, dated in 1850, gave his residuary real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to be converted into money, and directed them to pay the income of the investments to his daughter H. Wallop, during her life, for her separate use, and after her decease, to transfer the capital to her children, and if she should have no child, to such person or persons, and in such manner as she should, being unmarried, by deed, or, whether married or not, by will appoint, and in default of appointment, to the persons therein mentioned. The testator died in 1856, and in the following year H. Wallop married Moses Gibaut, who was domiciled in Jersey. By her will, H. Gibaut, in exercise of the power in her father's will, appointed 3000*l.* Consols, part of the fund, to S. Croxford, and 1000*l.* Consols, other part of the fund, to S. Waters; and gave the residue of her personal property, whether places in the Island of Jersey or elsewhere, and in her possession or in the hands of trustees, to her husband, M. Gibaut. She died in 1860, domiciled in Jersey, without issue. The executors under W. Wallop's will paid legacy duty, at 1*l.* per cent., on the whole of the residue of his estate; and the residue in court had been paid out to the claimants under H. Gibaut's will, with the exception of a sum retained to pay legacy or succession duty, if any should be payable. The Court directed payment of succession duty on the two legacies of 3000*l.* and 1000*l.*, and payment of the residue of the fund to M. Gibaut, no duty being claimed by the Crown in respect of the residue given to him by his wife. The Crown rested the claim on the Legacy Duty Act, 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 7, which charges every testamentary appointment of personality under a general power, and contended, that the rule established in Thomson v. The Advocate-General (12 Cl. & Fin. 1; 9 Jur., part 1, p. 217), that legacy duty is not payable on legacies given by the will of a testator who dies domiciled abroad, does not extend to appointments under a power; and if the duty was not given by the Legacy Duty Acts, then it was claimed under the Succession Duty Act, on the authority of Re Lovelace, and of The Attorney-General v. Fitzjohn (2 H. & Norm. 465). The Court disallowed the claim to the duty under the Legacy Duty Acts, on the ground that it was settled that the Legacy Duty Acts are confined to England, and, as personal estate follows the person, cannot extend to legacies given by testators domiciled abroad; and that the Legislature, in the 7th section of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, by putting legacies given under general powers in the same category as legacies given out of the testator's own estate, must have intended them to be subject to the same rule. But the Court considered, that the Succession Duty Act ought not to receive the same limited construction as to its applying only to persons domiciled in Great Britain, as had been given to the Legacy Duty Acts, and saw no reason to alter their determination in Lovelace's case. "Not only," said Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., "is the act, in the 2nd section, which defines what shall be a succession, wide and general in its terms, but the definition there given extends to, and embraces, not only testamentary dispositions, but dispositions of every description by way of settlement or otherwise; and dispositions not only of personal, but of real property also. The act, therefore, was clearly intended to extend to cases which can in no way be affected by the rule, that mobilia sequuntur personam; and it would be very difficult to say, that in the case of real estate devised by a testator domiciled out of Great Britain, the devisee could be liable to the duty imposed by this act, which would clearly be the case, according to the terms of the act, if the legatee of the personal estate of a person so domiciled, or the appointee of the donee of a person so domiciled, was not equally intended to be so liable. The 44th section of the act, rendering the trustees of the property subject to the duty personally liable, seems to me in some degree to strengthen the view, and it is, I think, much confirmed by the exemption clause, sect. 18, which points out the cases in which the duty is not to be chargeable. I adhere, therefore, to our determination in the case of Re Lovelace, and am of opinion that, by the 2nd section of the act, the legatees of persons domiciled out of Great Britain, and the appointees by will of the donees of powers so domiciled, were intended to be made subject to the payment of the duty."

It is not stated, and does not appear to have been thought material, whether or not the legatees were domiciled in Great Britain.

The scope of the Succession Duty Act being, in respect of domicile, more extensive than that of the Legacy Duty Act, in the opinion of the Court (or rather of Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., for Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, L. J., held, more vaguely, the opinion that some sort of duty was payable somehow), it was not found difficult to arrive at the conclusion that the 18th section of the Succession Duty Act, which provides, that "no duty shall be payable under that act by any person in respect of a succession, who, if the same was a legacy bequeathed to him by the predecessor, would be exempted from the payment of duty in respect thereof under the Legacy Duty Act," did not prevent the duty from attaching, but was confined to cases which, being within the scope of the general provisions of the Legacy Duty Acts, were by special provision exempted, as had been decided in The Attorney-General v. Fitzjohn (2 H. & Norm. 465), with reference to a succession created by the will of a testator who died before the imposition of the legacy duty on such succession.

The point actually decided in Wallop's case was identical with the point in Lovelace's case; but Sir G. J. Turner, L. J., in stating his opinion to be, that succession duty is chargeable on the legatees of persons domiciled out of Great Britain, went far beyond what was laid down in the earlier case. In Lovelace's case, Maria Vanneck, on her marriage with Mr. Lovelace in 1817, settled her share of the residue of her father's estate upon trust for her issue, and, in default of issue, upon such trusts as she should appoint. Having subsequently acquired a French domicile, she made a testamentary apportionment of 10,000*l.*, part of the fund, to natives of France, domiciled there, and died at Bordeaux, where she was domiciled, in 1856. The fund having been paid into court, under the Trustees Relief Act, the Crown claimed legacy and succession duties. The claim of legacy duty was abandoned at the hearing, and that of legacy duty was disallowed by Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., but was allowed by the Lords Justices on appeal, on the ground that the legatees took by relation under the settlement. The Vice-Chancellor appears to have rested his decision on the very strange argument, that appointments under general powers were not within the 2nd section of the act, but were chargeable only according to the provisions of the 4th section—an argument which appears to us to be clearly untenable, but which seems to have driven the Lords Justices as far wrong in the opposite direction, for they, in their anxiety to avoid the consequences of the Vice-Chancellor's conclusion, that no appointment confers a succession unless it falls within the terms of the 4th section, could see no alternative but to revert to the donor of the power as a predecessor under the general terms of the 2nd section. We have already attempted to determine the true construction of the 4th section (7 Jur., N.S., part 2, p. 507), and we think that it affords a conclusive answer to the ratio decidendi enounced in Lovelace's case, which, as we have seen, is very different from that in Wallop's case, though the Court considered the cases to be identical, as in fact they were. The object of the 4th section is to explain what is to be regarded as a succession, and who is to be regarded as the successor, in the cases of an appointment, 1, under a general power; 2, under a special power; and it provides that, where a person has "a general power of appointment under any disposition of property taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act," i. e. a power which does not arise until such death; as where it is given by the will of a relation who dies after the passing of the act, the donee upon exercising the power (coming into enjoyment of the dominion over the property) shall be deemed then to take a succession from the donor; but in the case of the exercise of a special power, the appointee shall take the appointed property as a succession from the donor of the power. The section, as we stated in the article referred to, was clear enough in the original bill, and stood thus:—"Where any person shall have a general power of appointment arising upon the death," &c., and was altered in committee by some one who did not know what he was doing, but who has not succeeded in making it quite unintelligible. There is no reason to hesitate as to the construction, for it is nothing more than the 18th section of the stat. 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, abridged almost to obscurity. If, then, the Legislature has provided that in the case only of an appointment under a special power, the appointee takes a succession from the donor, while in the case of a general power, the appointor takes a succession from the donor, it follows that, for the purposes of the act, the donee of a general power takes the power (if he exercises it) as his own property, and if he appoints it so to create a succession, his appointee will take that succession from him.

If Lovelace's case and Wallop's case cannot be supported on the grounds on which the decision in the former case was expressly rested, then the tenability of the ground taken in the latter case will have to be considered; and if it is established, many more fights must be fought between the Crown and foreigners, or claimants of foreign property, or under foreign settlers, and the question, which was intelligibly and satisfactorily settled in Thomson v. The Advocate-General (12 Cl. & Fin. 1; 9 Jur., part 1, p. 217), must be reopened. In that case the House of Lords, following the unanimous opinion of the judges, decided, that as the general words of the statute, "every legacy given by any will or testamentary instrument of any person," must of necessity receive some limitation in their application—such necessary limitation, as to personal estate, is, that the statute does not extend to the will of any person who at the time of his death was domiciled out of Great Britain, whether the assets are locally situate within England or not, and wherever and however the assets may be administered. (See The Attorney-General v. Napier, 15 Jur., part 1, p. 253). The enunciation of the rule was carefully limited to personal estate, and therefore the argument of Lord Justice Turner, founded on the difficulty of applying the limitation to real estate, falls to the ground. What countenance, then, does the language of the Succession Duty Act give to the application of a different rule to succession duty? The material words in the 2nd section are, "Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become entitled to any property upon the death of any person, and every devolution by law" [by what law?] "of any interest in property upon the death of any person to any other person, shall be deemed to have conferred a succession;" "and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, &c." Here is as abundant reference to persons as in the Legacy Duty Act, and the only difference between the two acts, as to their scope, is, that one is confined to testamentary and intestate successions, and the other extends to settlements—that it also extends to real estate is beside the question—the Legacy Duty Acts do the same. As was said in Thomson v. The Advocate-General, some limit must be put to the generality of the enactment. It cannot be meant to charge the duty on a succession by a Frenchman to French rentes bequeathed by a Frenchman domiciled in France, and hardly, we should think, to charge Bank Consols bequeathed by a French testator, whether to a Frenchman or to an Englishman. What limit, then, can be suggested, with any show of reason, other than that by which the operation of the Legacy Duty Acts is bound—the domicile of the person who creates the succession? We are satisfied that it will be found impossible in practice to apply the construction put upon the act in Re Wallop.

REPORT OF THE CHANCERY FUNDS COMMISSIONERS.

HER Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the constitution of the Accountant-General's department of the Court of Chancery, the forms of business in use therein, and the provisions for the custody and management of the stocks and funds of the Court, have made their Report, dated the 17th day of February, 1864, which has been presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of her Majesty. The Report is long and elaborate, and deserves a careful perusal. The following is a summary of recommendations contained in the Report, and is appended to it:—

AS REGARDS THE ACCOUNTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, AND THE FORMS OF BUSINESS IN USE THEREIN.

As regards the Financial Department of the Court of Chancery generally, and the Constitution thereof.

1. That the act of the 12 Geo. 1, c. 32, should be repealed, and that the Accountant-General's Office should be re-constructed under General Orders to be issued by the Lord Chancellor.

2. That a standing committee consisting of certain officers of the Court of Chancery should be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, whose duty it should be to consider any suggestions that may be made for improving the mode of transacting the business of the office, and to report to the Lord Chancellor, at least once a year, whether any and what alterations should be made in the General Orders regulating the department.

As regards the Relations between the Accountant-General's Department and the Bank of England.

1. That the regulation which prevents the Accountant-General from intermeddling with the suitors' monies and effects should be preserved intact; and that the actual receipt, payment, and delivery of the monies and securities belonging to the suitors should, as heretofore, be managed by the Bank of England; but that the system of duplicate accounts should be discontinued, and that the Bank should keep the Accountant-General's account in the same manner as it keeps the accounts of its other customers.

2. That means ought to be provided for receiving money and cashing the Accountant-General's drafts, either under the same roof as the Accountant-General's Office, or in its immediate vicinity.

3. That the Bank should be remunerated for the work which it performs for the Chancery suitors by a fixed annual payment, to be from time to time settled by the Lord Chancellor and the Governor of the Bank, with the approbation of the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury.

As regards the Relations between the Accountant-General's Office and the Report Office.

1. That the practice of filing certificates at the Report Office should be discontinued; and that certificates of transactions recorded in the Accountant-

General's books should be obtained from the Accountant-General's Office.

As regards the Relations between the Accountant-General's Office and the Registrar's Office.

1. That instead of being required to act upon the original order, the Accountant-General should be furnished with, and act upon, pay sheets or abstracts in a tabular form prepared in the Registrar's Office, for the accuracy of which the registrar should be responsible.

2. That so long as the Accountant-General is required to act upon the original order, particular attention should be paid to the suggestions contained in the Accountant-General's observations, paper No. 9, par. 2, viz. :—

(1). Every decree or order directing the payment or transfer in, or carrying over of any funds should have inserted in the body thereof the exact title of the fund, as the same is to be raised in the Accountant-General's books, and not describe the fund by reference to the title of the decree or order.

(2). Every decree or order dealing with a fund in court should have inserted in the body thereof the title of the fund from the Accountant-General's voluntary certificate, and not describe the same by reference to the title of the order.

(3). In every decree or order dealing with a fund in court containing the expressions "out of any other cash," and "out of any other Bank Annuities," the source from which the other funds are expected to come should be stated.

(4). In every decree or order directing the computation of interest, the day up to which such interest is to be computed should be named.

8. That so long as the Accountant-General is required to act upon the original order, money orders should have a distinguishing mark or stamp impressed upon them by the assistant clerk to the registrar before being left for entry; that they should be entered in registrar's books distinct from other decrees and orders, and should be consecutively numbered, and that each sheet when filled should be transmitted by the entering clerk to the Accountant-General's Office; and that the certificates of the taxing masters and of the judges' chief clerks, upon which the Accountant-General has to act (after being filed in the Report Office, and after an office copy has been made for the solicitor), should also be transmitted to the Accountant-General's Office; and that the clerk of certificates, whose duties will cease on the discontinuance of filing the Accountant-General's certificates at the Report Office, should be accommodated with a seat in the Accountant-General's Office, and that it should be his duty to make and keep an index to money orders, and to have the custody of the certificates of the taxing masters and chief clerks, and also of the sheets of the registrar's books until the end of the year, when they should be transferred to the clerk of reports.

4. That in decrees and orders made in any cause commenced since 1852, the reference to the record described in 1 Consol. Orders, 48, should be added to the title of the account to be raised.

5. That the practice of requiring the registrar's directions for the sale, transfer, and delivery of stock and securities, should be discontinued.

6. That the counter-signature of the registrar to the Accountant-General's drafts should be dispensed with.

As regards the Internal Work of the Office, and the Establishment of a System of Audit.

1. That directions to the Accountant-General in money orders, or in the pay sheets or abstracts thereof (as the case may be), should in all cases be noted by the Accountant-General; and that the Accountant-General should operate thereon, on receipt of the money order or pay sheet, unless or until a request from one of the solicitors for any of the parties or the persons interested in the cause or matter to suspend any of such directions, be left with the Accountant-General; and that directions to the Accountant-General contained in an earlier order or pay sheet, should not be superseded by directions of later date, unless specially ordered.

2. That the practice now adopted in the Accountant-General's Office in preparing drafts drawn on the Bank of England should be amended; and that every signature and counter-signature upon a draft should be evidence of examination by the person who signs; and that no draft should be signed until it is applied for by the person entitled thereto; and that every draft should be passed to account as soon as it is drawn and issued.

3. That the Accountant-General should be relieved from the duty of signing drafts on the Bank, and authorised to grant deputations to officers of his department to sign drafts under regulations to be approved by the Lord Chancellor.

4. That a system of audit should be established in accordance with the principles defined in the memorandum drawn up by Mr. Crawford and Mr. Anderson. Appendix, No. 37.

As regards the Accountant-General's Salary and Allowances, the Accountant-General's Clerks, and as regards Office Hours and Vacations.

1. That the salary of the office of Accountant-General should be fixed, on a vacancy, at the sum recommended by the select committee of the House of Commons on official salaries in 1850, viz. at 2000*l.* a year.

2. That the allowance which the Accountant-General receives to enable him to defray office expenses should cease, and that the necessary office expenses should be defrayed out of the Suits' Fee Fund, in the same manner as similar expenses for other departments of the court are defrayed.

3. That the Accountant-General should be at liberty to appoint a deputy during vacation, with the approbation of the Lord Chancellor, without remuneration; and in case of absence on account of illness at any other period of the year, to appoint a deputy, to be approved of by the Lord Chancellor, for such time as his Lordship may sanction, and to be remunerated by the Accountant-General at such rate, not exceeding one-third of his salary, as the Lord Chancellor may determine.

4. That the clerks should be divided into classes, with minimum and maximum salaries, and an annual progressive increase for length of service, according to the rule generally adopted in the public establishments; that the scale of salaries and annual increments should be settled by the Lord Chancellor, with the approval of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury; and that the Lord Chancellor should be empowered to direct instalments of salaries and pensions to be paid monthly.

5. That the act 52 Geo. 3, c. liv (local and personal), should be repealed, and that sect. 46 of the act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, wherein are incorporated the provisions of the act 22 Vict. c. 26, by which the superannuation of public civil servants are regulated, should be extended to the clerks in the Accountant-General's Office.

6. That the Accountant-General's Office should be open during vacations on such days as the chambers of the vacation judge may be open, or on such days as the Lord Chancellor shall direct; that office hours during vacation should be from eleven to one; and office hours during each day the offices are open for the remainder of the year, from ten to four, except on Saturdays, when the office should be closed at two; that the office should be open during vacation on the three days next after the dividends of any Government stock in court become payable, from ten to two.

7. That the hours of attendance of all the clerks, except during vacation, should be during office hours, and in times of pressure during such farther period of each day as the Accountant-General may from time to time prescribe for the due despatch of the current business.

8. That during vacations such number of clerks should attend as the Accountant-General may consider requisite for the due despatch of the current business.

9. That in the event of any account being overdrawn, the extent to which the account may be overdrawn, and the circumstances under which the error may have occurred, should be forthwith reported by the Accountant-General to the Lord Chancellor, who should be at liberty to direct, that the amount overdrawn should be written off from the Sutors' Fee Fund; and in case such overdrawn should have occurred through the wilful neglect or default of any officer of the court, to direct that the amount so overdrawn should be made good by him, or deducted from his salary.

As regards the Operations of paying Money and transferring Stock and Securities into Court.

1. That the Accountant-General should, on a written request, without requiring the production of any order, issue his directions for the payment of money, the transfer of stock, and the deposit of securities in any cause, either to the credit of the cause generally, or to a separate account which may have been directed to be opened in the cause.

2. That the reference to the record should be inserted in the directions issued by the Accountant-General, and added to the titles of causes in the Accountant-General's books.

3. That directions should be signed by such of the clerks as the Accountant-General may from time to time appoint for the purpose, and should be ready during vacations on the same day they are bespoken, and at other times by eleven o'clock on the morning following.

4. That the person applying for the direction should write upon it the address to which he desires a formal voucher or certificate to be sent when the amount shall have been placed to the account mentioned in the direction.

5. That at the foot of the direction to pay in money or deposit securities there should be a form of receipt to be signed by the cashier of the Bank, and to be given to, and retained by, the person paying in.

6. That the Accountant-General should, on the next day but one that the office is open after the amount is paid in to the Bank, transmit by the general post to the address written on the direction, a voucher or certificate of the money having been placed to the proper account in his books.

7. That a purchaser paying into court the purchase money of an estate sold under an order of the Court, should be entitled to require that the purchase money should not be dealt with without notice to him by signing a request to that effect upon the direction.

8. That each amount paid in under the 69th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, should be distinguished in the Accountant-General's ledgers by a distinct number, and that a separate certificate of each sum paid in under the 69th section should be issued when required, and that every order dealing with a sum paid in under that section should refer to the sum by the number attached thereto in the Accountant-General's ledgers.

9. That money should be received from, and paid to, suitors at any branch of the Bank of England.

10. That arrangements should be made with the Bank of England with a view to dispense with the attendance of the Accountant-General at the Bank for the purpose of accepting and transferring stock.

As regards Securities other than Government Securities deposited in the Court.

1. That foreign and other securities ordered to be brought into court should be deposited in the same manner as exchequer bills; and that the interest or dividends on such securities should be received by one of the cashiers of the Bank.

As regards the Operations of transferring Stock and paying Money out of Court.

1. That powers of attorney for the receipt of monies and securities in the custody of the court should be dispensed with, and that in lieu thereof there should be substituted an authority to the effect contained in the Form No. 23, in the schedule to the General Orders of the 11th November, 1862, made under the Companies Act, 1862.

2. That affidavits of residue and affidavits verifying calculations should be dispensed with, and that all calculations and apportionments (in the absence of a special direction to the contrary) should be made by the Accountant-General's clerks.

3. That statutory declarations should be substituted for affidavits verifying facts.

4. That payment of any monies to the Receiver-General of Inland Revenue, the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the Assistant Paymaster-General, and the Solicitor to the Treasury, or any other official person for whom an account is kept at the Bank of England, should be made by the Accountant-General transmitting to the Bank a direction to write off the amount from his account to the account to which the money is to be placed.

5. That when the amount payable to any person does not exceed the amount transmissible by post-office orders, the person to whom the money is payable should be at liberty to authorise the transmission thereof by a post-office order; and that a list of the post-office orders to be issued should be transmitted daily to the Postmaster-General with a direction from the Accountant-General for the Bank to write off the total amount from his account to the account of the Postmaster-General, who should deduct from each amount authorised to be transmitted his charges for transmitting the same, as well as the postage.

As regards Transcripts of Accounts and Certificates.

1. That transcripts should be ready for delivery to the solicitors at the expiration of thirty-six hours after they had been bespoken or left to be made up.

2. That the entries in transcripts should shew the price at which stock and securities entered therein were bought or sold, and the date of the order and certificate (if any) under which any transfer or payment of money, or any carrying over therein mentioned, was made.

3. That during the month of November in each year transcripts of all accounts dealt with during the year should be left at the Accountant-General's Office to be made up.

4. That on bespeaking or making up a transcript, a fee of 6s. 8d., if the entries exceed three and do not exceed six, or of 13s. 4d. if the entries exceed six, should be allowed to the solicitor.

5. That transcripts should be signed by one of the Accountant-General's clerks.

6. That transcripts so signed should be evidence of the contents of the Accountant-General's books.

7. That certificates should be signed by such of the Accountant-General's clerks as he may depute for the purpose, and should be ready during vacations on the same day that they are bespoken, and at other times by eleven o'clock on the following morning.

AS REGARDS THE FUNDS OF THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

As regards the Propriety of making any Alteration in the present Mode of buying and selling Stock for the Suitors.

1. That it is expedient to defer the further consideration of the question as to the propriety of making any alteration in the mode of buying and selling stock for the suitors until after the establishment of a deposit account for the suitors of the Court of Chancery.

As regards the Establishment of a Deposit Account.

1. That it is expedient to establish a deposit account for suitors' monies in the Court of Chancery, and to allow to the suitors interest at the rate of 2l. per cent. per annum upon the monies belonging to them whilst in the custody of the court; but without depriving them of the right to require the investment thereof at any time on their own behalf, and at their own risk.

As regards the Management of the Funds of the Court.

1. That measures ought to be taken at once for the purpose of relieving the Chancery suitors from the great burthen which has lately been thrown upon them by the increased expenses connected with the administration of lunatics' estates.

2. That in order that the whole income and expenditure of the Court of Chancery may be presented in an intelligible form, the balance of cash which have arisen from the income of funds A. and B., and the cash and stock on fund D., and on "the money arising by sale of the six clerks' offices," should be carried over to fund C., and that the accruing income of funds A. and B., should be paid in and placed to the credit of fund C., and that the whole expenditure of the court now charged upon the incomes of fund A. and fund B., and upon fund C., should be charged upon this amalgamated account, which might be termed the Chancery income and expenditure account.

3. That the appeal deposit account should be amalgamated with the Chancery income and expenditure account, and that appeal deposits instead of being lodged with the senior registrar should be paid into the Bank, and placed to the credit of that account, and that the repayments of appeal deposits should be made thereout.

4. That the whole amount of brokerage chargeable to suitors should be carried over and placed to the credit of the Chancery income and expenditure account, and that the broker's remuneration should be paid thereout.

5. That the Chancery income and expenditure account should be annually balanced on the 1st October (the day of annually balancing the suitors' accounts).

6. That the income tax on the salaries, pensions, and compensations charged upon the amalgamated account, and on any other monies payable thereout liable to income tax, should be deducted by the Accountant-General, and paid over by him to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, less the amount of income tax deducted by the Bank on the dividends of stock payable to the amalgamated account.

7. That the custody of Parliamentary deposits, under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 20, should be transferred from the Accountant-General's department to the Board of Trade or some other public office.

8. That the provisions contained in the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 98, authorising investigations to be made into suitors' unclaimed accounts, should be varied, and that such investigations should be made on the 1st October in every year, and should be extended to all accounts not dealt with for ten years instead of being limited to stock accounts, and should also be extended to accounts where the only dealing has been the investment of dividends.

9. That at the time of annually balancing the suitors' accounts, there should be transferred to a separate ledger, and carried to the Chancery income and expenditure account, balances not exceeding 2l. on any accounts, and also balances exceeding 2l. and not exceeding 5l. on any accounts not dealt with during the preceding year, and that any amount so carried over, with any dividends accrued thereon that may be reclaimed, should be made good out of the same account.

10. That the annual balance book should be continued to be made up, and, after being signed by the chief clerk of the Accountant-General, should be deposited on or before the 1st November in each year in the Record Office at the Rolls.

11. That purchases and sales of stock on fund (A.) should be so regulated in amount as to affect the market as little as possible.

12. That all fees payable into the Suitors' Fee Fund Account should be collected by stamps.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 16, 1864.

AN application was lately made to Mr. Justice Mellor, at chambers, by a father to obtain the custody of his child, which was detained from him by the mother, upon which his Lordship, after taking time to consider the matter, made an order in the father's favour. The subject is one so interesting in its nature, and so constantly mooted since the institution of the Divorce Court, that it will not be out of place to discuss the law bearing upon it. The case relied upon by Mr. Justice Mellor is the case of Rex v. Greenhill (4 Ad. & El. 625), where it is laid down that the custody of a legitimate child belongs to the father, while that of an illegitimate child belongs to the mother. In this case, the mother had removed the children, who were legitimate, from the custody of the father, on the alleged ground that he was leading an immoral life, and would contaminate them. It appeared upon the affidavits that he had formed a connexion with another woman, and had ceased to live with his wife, but he had not brought this woman to the home in which his children were. It also appeared that the mother was in every respect a proper person to have the care of her children. Thus, the case was one of a father neglecting his conjugal and parental duties on the one hand, and on the other, of a mother duly performing hers. The authorities on the point are fully gone into and considered in the arguments of counsel and the judgments of the Court, and the decision is, that as there was no apprehension of cruelty or of contamination of the children by the father, by some exhibition of gross profligacy on his part, he was entitled to have the custody of them. Although there was the illicit connexion between the father and the woman spoken of, it was not pretended that she kept the house to which the children were to be brought, or that there was anything in his conduct so offensive to decency, as to render it improper that the children should be left under his control.

This case strongly illustrates the rule of our common law on the point, viz. that the proper custody of a child, not old enough to exercise a discretion itself, is undoubtedly the custody of the father, except where the enforcement of it would be most clearly injurious to the health or morals of the child. The law takes no notice of the mother's feelings, or even of the interest of the children, who, generally speaking, at such a tender age, look more to the mother than to the father for sympathy and aid and education. In a recent case in the Divorce Court (Cartledge v. Cartledge, 31 L. J., P., M., & A. 84), the rule was acted upon, to the extent of ordering an infant seven months' old to be given to its father. The Judge Ordinary says, "There are certain principles to which I am bound to attend, and there can be no doubt, that by the common law the father has a right to the custody of the child. The statute has given the Court discretionary powers to make orders for the custody of children pendente lite, and these powers are the same as are given to the Court of Chancery by the act which is commonly called Talfourd's Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 54). That discretion I must exercise, however, keeping in view the prima facie legal right of the father, and to take that away the mother must establish something more than her mere maternal right."

A stronger case than this can hardly be put, for although the mother was not nursing the child, she of course was, by every law of nature, the most fitting person to have the care of it, which yet she was precluded from having unless she would live with her husband. Access to it the Court would give her, but this permission, when it could only be made available by going to the house of a husband from whom she was seeking a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, was little more than a mockery.

The question was again very fully considered by Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C., in the case of In re Curtis (reported 28 L. J., Ch., 459). There the Vice-Chancellor says—"Now, that this Court will exercise the jurisdiction is beyond all controversy. The cases which have most frequently occurred of the Court exercising it have been cases where the father, being of a perverted condition of mind in respect of religious or moral views or habits, is inculcating such habits and views upon his children in such a way as to be most grievously and seriously detrimental to them in after life as members of society. The Court will also interfere unquestionably where the father, although he may not, by teaching or example, tend to demoralise his children, treats them with such a degree of violence, harshness, or cruelty, as to appear utterly unfit to have the conduct or management of children." His Honor then considers very minutely the facts of the particular case, which appears to have been a case, if any can be put, in which it would have been better for the children to be in the custody of their mother, and decreed that he should have it.

The law, then, is clear as to the father's rights, and is but slightly affected by the provisions of Talfourd's Act. The law, however, only applies to children of such an age as not to be considered capable of exercising a discretion as to their custody. What this age was does not appear to have been clearly settled until the case of Alicia Race (26 L. J., Q. B., 169), where it was held, that guardianship for nurture continues until a child has attained the age of fourteen, and that the guardian for nurture—the father, if he is alive—is entitled to the custody of the child during that period. The intellects of children may vary very much, but the Court cannot enter upon this consideration, and must lay down a rule which will be generally beneficial, although it may operate harshly in particular instances. Lastly, in the case of Hyde v. Hyde (29 L. J., P., M., & A. 150), Sir Cresswell Cresswell laid down the same rule:—"There are two or three cases in the books shewing, that before the age this child has attained, a child has a right to choose his own custody; but in the recent case of Alicia Race the Court of Queen's Bench held, that guardianship for nurture continues until the age of fourteen, and that a child has no right before that age to exercise his own choice as to quitting or remaining in the custody of his father."

Thus the rule of law on the subject is clear and settled. The father's conduct must be very decidedly immoral, and moreover, immoral at home, to deprive him of the custody of his children until the age of fourteen. He may be a gambler or adulterer elsewhere than in the house where his children are living, or have other vicious habits; but unless he so acts as to be likely to contaminate them, or is so violent as to be likely to injure them, he is their guardian, and entitled to their custody; and the mother must be content with entire separation from, or only occasional access to, her children, even at their tenderest age, unless she will live with her husband.

In these days, when the facilities for divorce are so increased, this stringent rule may be a wholesome one. It may induce a mother, who would otherwise be eager to obtain a divorce or a judicial separation, to sacrifice her feelings rather than be separated from her children; and it may also induce some, who are inclined to break their marriage vows, to pause before they take the step.

As soon as the child has attained the age of fourteen, he may exercise his own choice as to living with either parent.

THE defects of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, have at last forced themselves upon the consideration of Parliament, and, as we collect from the report of the debate on Friday, the 8th inst., are to be referred to a select committee. Whether it be from defects inherent in the act itself, or the mismanagement of those who have been concerned in carrying out its provisions, it has been a great disappointment to the public; and some of its provisions, if half that is said is true, have opened the door to a large amount of fraud. We refer especially to the unhappy 92nd section, which has, perhaps, given rise to more litigation than any other one section of any modern statute. It is said to be a very common practice to insert imaginary creditors, so as to make up the numbers requisite to bind those who dissent; and we recently learnt from the public prints that an attorney had been struck off the rolls for a fraud of this description. This, however, rather applies to the working than to the construction of this much-discussed section, and is a defect which might perhaps be cured by greater care and watchfulness, but which ought to be prevented by statutory provision, if it can be done; but who can say at this present moment what is a valid deed of arrangement, when day after day deeds framed with care, and intended to be binding under this section, have been pronounced invalid by the Courts, because they impose some inequitable term upon the non-dissenting creditors, or do not put them in the same position as those who agree to the deed? As to the great point of cessio bonorum, the decisions, upon the whole, are to the effect, that the section intends to make it optional with the creditors, and to leave it to their discretion whether the debtor should surrender all his property, or be allowed to retain it. But it still remains to be considered by a court of appeal; and although it may appear to be wise and just to leave the creditors such a discretion, we apprehend that much may be said against it, and that it may be greatly abused; and we think that this is one of the questions which deserves the attention of the select committee. Lord Westbury may say that the judges have been astute to find out defects in these deeds. On the other hand, it may be said that a section containing such important provisions ought to have been penned in the simplest and clearest language, and that the quantity of litigation and argument upon the section proves that it is obscure and perplexing. We think also the committee might consider whether it was wise to retain in the Bankruptcy Act the provisions as to reputed ownership. This part of the law of bankruptcy is most harsh and unjust in its operation, and the reason for its existence, that traders obtained false credit by being the apparent owners of other persons' goods, has long ceased in practice to be a sound one. In the case of Belcher v. Bellamy (17 L. J., Ex., 219), Lord Wensleydale thus expresses himself:—"The spirit of modern commerce is very different from that of ancient commerce, and if the Legislature had to pass Bankrupt Acts in the present times, they would not, in my opinion, consider it just that one party should pay his debts with the goods of others. The truth is, that at the present day a trader does not gain credit from the mere fact of having a warehouse full of goods, but from his mode of dealing and his general character."

There can be no doubt of the truth and good sense of Lord Wensleydale's remarks, which, however, do not appear to have occurred to the framers of the present act. The fact that non-traders can now be made bankrupts, and that such persons may obtain a false credit by dwelling in houses sumptuously furnished, and indulging in a style of living which argues large means, does not, in our opinion, affect the question. The creditors of such persons do not generally trust to these appearances; they make inquiries about the individual before they run a large risk, and if they neglect to do so they have only to blame themselves; whereas, in commercial transactions, it may be said that the possession of a large stock of goods implies, or in former times did imply, respectability and substance.

The Attorney-General in his speech on Friday, the 8th inst., if the report of that speech is correct, hinted gently that the commissioners had not efficiently worked the act, and the necessity for a chief judge was again alleged. We are inclined to think that the appointment of a chief judge is desirable, with an appeal, of course, from his decisions to the Lords Justices or Lord Chancellor. This point will, of course, be considered by the committee, who have no easy task before them, if they intend to grapple with the whole law of bankruptcy, and all the objections which are made to the present statute. We trust that they will not shrink from the labour, and that they will at last place upon a satisfactory footing a branch of the law which involves such important interests, and is hourly in operation, and which especially requires to be clear, intelligible, and just.

Correspondence.

RE WALLOP'S TRUSTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—It appears to me that Lord Justice Knight Bruce thought that there was a succession in the above case from the testator William Wallop, as donor of the power of appointment; nor could his Lordship have thought otherwise, consistently, at least, with the following passage of his judgment in Re Lovelace (5 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 695):—"My opinion is in favour of the Crown claiming, as it does, only a single duty—that is to say, no duty in respect of any acquisition, or supposed acquisition, of property by Mrs. Lovelace—no duty as against that lady or her estate—only a duty in respect of her execution of the power as against those, or some of those, in whose favour she exercised it." Lord Justice Turner, however, said—"The respondents also argued that the property in question ought to be regarded as the property of Mrs. Lovelace, and that her domicile having been a foreign domicile, this duty ought not to attach, and would not have attached, upon her property under the Legacy Duty Act. I can find nothing in the act which can make this property the property of Mrs. Lovelace, unless the case falls within the 4th section, and I have already stated that, in my opinion, it does not; and if the property cannot be considered as the property of Mrs. Lovelace, the principle on which the cases under the Legacy Duty Act proceed has not, as it seems to me, any application." Alas! to what inconsistency does not this perplexing act lead! In the case of Re Wallop's Trusts, the donor of the power died in 1856; the 4th section therefore applied, but the foreign domicile of the appointor operated nothing, in the opinion of Lord Justice Turner, whose judgment in Re Lovelace had probably led the parties to dispute the claim of the Crown, and the fortunate Mr. Trevor carried off once more the palm of victory. Lord Justice Knight Bruce, however, was, I think, consistent, as I believe his judgment to have been given under the 2nd section of the act, and on the ground that the payment of legacy duty by the executors of the donor of the power of appointment had not cleared the appointees, who took a succession from the donor of the power; and as the rate of duty was the same in either view, the Lords Justices could agree in the decision.

Your obedient servant,

Rolls-chambers, Chancery-lane.

G. L.

[As Lord Justice Turner, in Re Wallop's Trusts, expressly founded his judgment on grounds which were not taken in Lovelace's case, we thought, and think, that it would be rash to make any inference from the decision in the earlier case as to the considerations which led Justice Knight Bruce to that in the later case. But, indeed, his Lordship's judgment in the one case is very little more explanatory than the few words he uttered in the other. To observe, with reference to the question, whether a succession was taken by C. from A. or from B., that the Crown did not make any claim in respect of a succession taken by B., was very little to the purpose; and that the judgment proceeded on the ground of a succession under the settlement, and not from the appointor, is only to be inferred from some expressions, which, though vague, seem to be inconsistent with the only other possible ratio decidendi, namely, that the succession duty attaches whatever may be the domicile of the predecessor.

But, as our correspondent has pointed out, Lord Justice Turner was clearly committed by his expressions in Re Lovelace to the construction which he has repudiated in Re Wallop's Trusts.—ED.]

Pollock's Practice of County Courts, with the Decisions of the Superior Courts and Tables of Fees and Costs; also Appendices containing all the Statutes, Rules of Practice, and Forms, including those relating to Bankruptcy. In Two Parts, with Tabular Indices. The Fifth Edition. By CHARLES EDWARD POLLOCK and HENRY NICOL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

[H. Sweet. 1864.]

NUMEROUS complaints having recently reached us with reference to the additional expense to which suitors in the county courts are put in order to enforce the judgments recovered by them in the case of debtors, against whom judgment summonses issue in the event of non-payment, we have referred to the new edition (the fifth) of the "County Court Practice," by Pollock and Nicol, and find, at page 98 of the appendix to part 1, rule 14, of the new "rules, orders, and forms for regulating the practice of the county courts, 1863:"—By this rule, "the costs of a judgment summons shall not be allowed against the judgment debtor, unless some order should have been made thereon," &c. It is, therefore, necessary for the suitor, in each case, to apply to the judge for "an order" to avoid being put to the extra cost of enforcing a judgment summons already issued by the court. It is only in this way that the manifest hardship of having to "throw good money after bad" can be avoided. And while we are on this subject, we desire to call attention to the admirable book now before us. It has swelled, in the course of time, from a handy manual of practice into a bulky tome. It was always distinguished for its clearness and accuracy, but since Mr. Nicol has been associated with Mr. Pollock, it has possessed, in addition to those indispensable qualities, an amplitude of information and direction in all matters within, and relating to, the county court jurisdiction, that must render it quite indispensable to both branches of the profession. In fact, no barrister nor attorney, whether engaged in chambers or in court, can be furnished with proper "tools to work with," in a compendious shape, unless he has this book at hand. It is most excellently arranged, and in this fifth edition (which is in itself an indisputable proof of great success) the facilities of reference are considerably improved, and as nearly perfect as may be. The leaves of the indices to the two parts, into which the work is divided, are of differently coloured edges to the rest, so that they can be turned to at once, which is a great advantage, when, in the course of an argument in court, cases and precedents have been referred to. Since the last edition of the book appeared, several acts have passed the Legislature, which affect the jurisdiction and practice of county courts; for instance, the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 57, limiting the power of commitment; the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862; the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862; the Alkali Act, 1863. By the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, the county courts have all the powers possessed by the Court of Chancery under the Companies Act, 1862, for the winding up of such societies; and the rules and forms framed under the Companies Act are, by a county court rule, made the rules which are to be followed in the county courts. The editors have placed them in an appendix, as well as the forms which have been altered, so as to adapt them, as far as possible, for use in the county courts. Messrs. Pollock and Nicol have also carefully noted all the "cases" which affect the county court jurisdiction and practice that have been decided since the last edition of their book. They have also added notes of the judgments given by the Court of Appeal and superior courts on questions which have arisen under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and have inserted the County Court Bankruptcy Orders, 1863, which have only very recently come into operation, and which ought to be carefully studied by all practitioners. The editors have likewise been able to add numerous precedents and forms, some of which were only settled by the Court of Bankruptcy within a few weeks of the publication of this edition. In setting forth the sections of the recent acts, they have done a very useful thing. They have added marginal references to other statutes and sections which bear upon them, and to the rules and forms framed upon them. Again: to the rules are appended references to the sections and forms to which they relate; and to the forms, references to the sections of the acts, and rules upon which they are respectively based. In short, no diligence has been spared to make the book as practically useful as a work of the kind possibly can be. We are happy to find that the jurisdiction given to the county courts by the Customs Act, 1853; the Succession Duty Act, 1853; the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 and 1862; the Nuisances Removal Act, 1855; and the Copyright of Designs Act, 1858, will most probably be rarely resorted to, for the great danger now is, that the county courts will be too heavily weighted. Nevertheless, these statutes are all noticed by the editors in their introduction—which is quite a sufficient addition to labours which were already onerous, and which have been performed with great accuracy, ability, and intelligence, and which in their results are extremely valuable.

THE LAW of COPYRIGHT in WORKS of LITERATURE and ART, and in the Application of Designs. With the Statutes relating thereto. By CHARLES PALMER PHILLIPS, of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister at Law. In 8vo. 1863.

"Mr. Phillips has shewn, not only great diligence in collecting cases bearing upon the various topics which he has treated, but considerable judgment in the manner in which he has dealt with them. He has spared no pains to make his work reliable as a legal text-book, and at the same time equally useful to publishers, authors, artists, and other persons who are interested in works of literature, art, or design. In a word, such a book has long been wanted, and Mr. Phillips has given abundant proof of his ability to meet the desideratum."—Solicitors' Journal, Nov. 14, 1863.

"It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom, therefore, the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. The present editors have preserved this characteristic of Mr. Stone's volume in their own abundant additions to it."—Law Times.

NINE-TENTHS of the Total Profits are divided among the Assured. Considerably more than one-tenth of the Profits is derived from Policies which do not participate in the Profits, so that THE ASSURED HAVE LARGER BONUSES THAN IF THEY FORMED A MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, and received the whole of the Profits derived from their own Policies.

The net BONUS averaged about SIXTY PER CENT. on the Premiums paid, and TWO PER CENT. PER ANNUM on the Sums assured.

THE EXPENSES of Management are less than FIVE PER CENT. on the Income.

THE PREMIUMS are calculated for every half-year of age.

The Policies of this Society, in the hands of third parties, are not vitiated by SUIVIX, or by the Life assured proceeding beyond the limits allowed.

NOTICES of ASSIGNMENT of Policies registered and acknowledged free of charge. Printed Forms for such Notices furnished when required.

The usual Commission allowed to Solicitors introducing Insurances, the Commission being continued to the person originally entitled to it as long as the Policy remains in force, through whatever channel the Premium may be paid.

LOANS granted on the Society's Policies, on Reversions, Life Interests, and other approved Security.

The Annual Reports and full Statements of Account are regularly printed, and may be obtained on application.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 23, 1864.

It must have occurred to every person who watches the statutes which are passed in each session of Parliament, how often it happens that a statute, which seems to have been passed because the public interests and necessities required it, becomes as soon as it is passed a dead letter, and is never, or but seldom, called into operation, and thus only burthens the statute book. Thus, in the session of 1857 an act was passed (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), intituled "An Act to enable Married Women to dispose of Reversionary Interests in Personal Estate;" which contains the same provisions for enabling married women to convey away such interests without the concurrence of their husbands as those which are contained in the 91st section of the Fines and Recoveries Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74. Our readers are no doubt aware that a married woman may, on satisfying the Court of Common Pleas by affidavit, that her husband is lunatic, idiot, &c., obtain an order from that Court to dispense with the concurrence of her husband in the conveyance. Now, it would have seemed probable, that this provision in the more recent statute would have been acted upon by married women as often as the similar provision in the Fines and Recoveries Act; but it is matter of experience, that an application by a married woman to convey her future interest in personalty is hardly, if ever, made to the Court of Common Pleas. Those who suggested the necessity of the statute must be surprised at the little use that has been made of it.

Again: in the year 1861 an act was passed (24 Vict. c. 11), intituled "An Act to afford Facilities for the better Ascertainment of the Law of Foreign Countries when pleaded in Courts within her Majesty's Dominions." This would have seemed likely to be a most useful statute, inasmuch as everybody who practises in our courts knows that foreign lawyers, when put into the witness-box, differ from each other in their opinions, on a question of foreign law, as widely as any other class of scientific witnesses do. As was observed by Sir C. Cresswell in his judgment in Crispin v. Dogliani (32 L. J., P., M., & A. 109), "The difficulty of arriving at a correct conclusion as to foreign law, at all times great, is much increased when experts are examined, and give conflicting testimony, for the Court has no means of ascertaining the comparative merits and learning of the witnesses."

There being, therefore, this difficulty of ascertaining satisfactorily the law of a foreign country on any question arising in our courts, this provision, enabling parties to seek the law at the fountain head, was sound and sensible, and yet we are not aware of a single instance in which the statute has been called into operation. It may be, that in countries with which we have much intercourse, the provisions of the statute are unnecessary, as their law on any point can be found in their codes or text-books; and that in countries with which we have but little intercourse, there would be considerable difficulty, and delay and expense, in working the act; and after all, the judgment of the particular Court, whose opinion would be requested, might, from the constitution of the court, not be very reliable. Whatever the reason may be, we believe that, at all events, it is the fact, that this statute, which somebody must have considered was urgently required, is at present a useless addition to the statute book.

In the session of 1862 two acts were passed, which some persons supposed would greatly affect the transfer of, and title to, land—the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, "An Act to facilitate the Proof of Title to, and the Conveyance of, Real Estate," and the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67, "An Act for obtaining a Declaration of Title." It may be premature to say that these statutes are useless, as so short a time has elapsed since they were passed; but we understand it to be the fact, that instead of the public rushing to the offices established under their provisions to avail themselves of the benefits conferred by them, those offices are occupied only by the individuals who receive salaries for a readiness and willingness to do their duty when called upon.

Again: we find in other statutes particular provisions which would seem to have been passed because a necessity was felt for them, and which yet are seldom, if ever, applied; for instance, in the 2nd section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, there is a provision that, in actions brought for breach of contract to deliver specific goods, the judge shall have power to order the defendant to deliver the goods themselves, on payment of such a sum as the jury shall find the plaintiffs liable to pay for them. We are not aware that plaintiffs ever ask for an order under this section, which could always be defeated if it were made, by the defendant putting it out of his power to deliver the goods.

Statutes also are passed which are, beyond a doubt, most beneficial, if properly worked, but which become virtually inoperative by reason of the facilities afforded of defeating their provisions. Thus, the Summary Procedure for Bills of Exchange Act, 1855, "An Act to facilitate the Remedies on Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes, by the Prevention of frivolous or fictitious Defences," was in principle a most useful statute; but in consequence of the ease with which defendants make affidavits that they have a defence on the merits, the provisions of the statute are rendered nugatory. These affidavits are as much a matter of course as the common affidavits of merits. It may be said that the judge who gives leave to a defendant to appear upon such an affidavit cannot help himself; that it is not for him to say that the defendant is a perjurer, and that the plaintiff must prosecute him if he thinks he is; but prosecutions for perjury are not a pleasant task, nor are they likely to expedite the recovery of the sum due on the bill or note. There is certainly a difficulty in saying what should be done to make the statute work, but we think that everybody who has had much experience in issuing writs under its provisions will agree with us in saying, that virtually it has done no good, and that it has not prevented frivolous or fictitious defences to actions on bills and notes.

It may be asked, what harm a statute which is never worked can do to anybody; it lies sleeping quietly in the statute book, and there it may rest for ever; but some lawyers think it right to make themselves acquainted with the legislation of each session; and they have quite labour enough in mastering those acts which are brought into operation, and which they have to consult in the course of their practice. It is hard upon them to be also compelled to study a composition which they may as well forget as soon as they have read it. It is possible that acts of Parliament are too hastily suggested and enacted. The Legislature has endeavoured of late years to prune and curtail the enormous size of our statute book; and we venture to think that it ought on the same principle to abstain from passing any statute, the necessity for which is not clear and imperative. The two acts to which we have referred, the Land Transfer Act and the Declaration of Title Act, are at present a laughing-stock to the profession and the public. They had been talked of for years, were to work wondrous changes, and to destroy conveyancing; and at present we can only apply to them Lord Westbury's quotation in his judgment in The Alexandra case—"Parturiunt montes, &c."

The first statute which we have mentioned seemed one likely to be frequently put into practice, and was supplemental to the corresponding provisions in the Fines and Recoveries Act. There is no reason to complain of its being passed. The second, passed for the better ascertainment of the law of foreign countries, is neat and ingenious in its design; but there must have been so many difficulties, and so much delay and expense in working it, and probably also dissatisfaction and doubt felt in any case in which it was put into practice, that we can hardly suppose there was ever much hope of any good resulting from it.

Experimental legislation is hardly advisable, unless there is some great evil to be attacked, and the best mode of attacking it can only be matter of speculation. Still less is it advisable to legislate for a particular case which may never occur again. The statute book is quite large enough, and need not to be encumbered by statutes which are useless. We have mentioned only a few of such statutes; but we feel confident that if the statutes passed during the last ten sessions were looked through, several others would be found which have never been called into operation, and have quietly dropt into oblivion.

THE different plans for new law courts will, it seems, be again discussed.

No doubt, something ought to be done soon. The Lord Chancellor's plan of having the new courts located between the Temple and Lincoln's-inn seems to be in every respect the best; for there can be little doubt that it will be not only most convenient to solicitors and the bar that the courts should be placed on a site easily accessible to them, but there is also a great advantage in having them all under one roof.

The Benchers of Lincoln's-inn, who, we believe, candidly admit that they are interested parties, are about to agitate their scheme for building separate equity courts within the Inn. Their organ in the House of Commons, Mr. Selwyn, has given notice of a motion to ask whether the Government intends to accept the offer made by the Society of Lincoln's-inn in 1859, and since repeated, viz. either to give the ground necessary for the erection of courts for the Vice-Chancellors, or to build such courts at the expense of the Society, upon receiving, for a term of years, 4l. per cent. per annum on the actual outlay on the buildings from the Suitors' Fund, but without any charge upon, or guarantee from, the national exchequer.

The plan of the Benchers seems, however, to be but a makeshift of a very imperfect character, for even the equity courts would not be under the same roof, and one of them, the Rolls, would still remain at a most inconvenient distance from the others.

In the meantime, however, much inconvenience is suffered and injustice done by matters remaining as they are.

Two of the Vice-Chancellors are daily sitting in courts—mean, ill-ventilated, and unhealthy; and the persons whose property it is proposed to take in order to carry out the Lord Chancellor's plan are suffering losses from delay and uncertainty which cannot readily be calculated.

Whatever may be the result of the deliberations of Parliament, it is to be hoped that the public interests will be alone considered, both in the selection of the site, and, what is almost as important, in the choice of the architect, and that we shall eventually have in the metropolis courts of justice of which the country may be proud.

Addison on Wrongs and their Remedies. Second Edition.
[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes.]

THE relations of men to each other in our present complicated state of society are so varied, and the different kinds of property which they may possess so numerous, that the wrongs which may be inflicted by one man upon another, and for which the law affords redress, in respect of these relations and classes of property, are almost countless. It is, therefore, a bold undertaking to write a book professing to embrace the whole subject of these wrongs and remedies; and we think that Mr. Addison must have felt some fear lest, by publishing his work on torts, he should endanger the character which his previous work on contracts had deservedly established for him, of an able, learned, and painstaking author. But his fears, if he felt any, were groundless. His second work has only added to the reputation which the first had acquired, and has supplied the profession with a treatise on the whole law of torts, the want of which has long been felt. For although, in the Abridgments of Nisi Prius, and other works previously published, the several branches of this head of law were treated of, still a book was wanted which either in itself contained, or directed the reader where to look for, the law upon any wrongful act done by or to himself, or in respect of which he was desirous generally of obtaining information. Mr. Addison's book supplies the want, comprehending, as it does, almost every class of torts which man is capable of committing. In fact, he may say of it what Juvenal says of his own composition, "Quicquid agunt homines nostri est farrago libelli." Not that we mean to insinuate that the book is a "medley," which might be inferred from the use of the word

"farrago;" on the contrary, upon the whole, the matter is well and carefully arranged, and, by the help of the headings to the chapters, and a good index, any particular part of the subject may be easily found.

Each chapter, embracing a particular class of torts, is complete in itself. The first chapter explains what is an actual wrong, and the subsequent chapters each take a particular class of torts, and exhaust that division of the subject. In so concise a review of the work as we are compelled to make, it would be impossible to detail all its merits—one, and that by no means an insignificant one, is, that the style is easy and fluent, and that we can suppose even those who have a prejudice against lawyers and law books, taking an interest in the perusal of it; and we are clearly of opinion, that any educated person may acquire from the study of it sufficient information as to his rights and liabilities as a member of society.

It is said that a little law is a great evil; this may be true, if the meaning of the expression is, that it is an evil to have an imperfect and glimmering knowledge of what the law is. It can be no evil to a man to understand well and clearly a certain number of rules of law, only because there are many others which he does not know. Now, we consider that Mr. Addison's book will teach any man of moderate abilities a considerable amount of legal knowledge, which will be useful to him, and guide him in his way through life. Few men do not commit torts. It has not been our lot to meet with such gifted beings. They, of course, do not require to read the book, but to ordinary mortals it certainly may be useful.

In some trifling points we think the arrangement of the subjects might be improved—for instance, we do not understand why the subject of injuries by ferocious animals is coupled with injuries to realty. The connexion is not obvious. This, however, is a trivial defect, if any.

We also think that the omission to treat of one class of torts, viz. infringements of patent rights, is a mistake, especially as the book does treat of the kindred subject of copyright.

This omission must have been intentional, but we do not understand the reasons for it, and should have thought that a chapter on a subject which takes up so much of the time of the Courts, would have added to the completeness of the work.

The author has made some valuable additions in the second edition, which are noticed in the Preface, and to which he has evidently devoted great care and labour. Upon the whole, we consider the work as a most valuable addition to legal literature, and as one, not the smallest merit of which is, as we have already observed, that it is easily intelligible, not only to the lawyer, but to the general reader—in fact, to any person who may wish to know what his rights are in any case in which he considers he has sustained a wrong, or his liabilities in any case in which he suspects he has done one.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, April 14.

The report of amendments on the Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill was brought up and agreed to.

Their Lordships went into committee on the Punishment of Rape Bill.

Lord Wensleydale moved an amendment in the first clause, rendering the act compulsory instead of optional.

After a debate,

The Earl of Carnarvon said he would bring up a new clause on the report.

The remaining clauses were then agreed to, and the bill passed through committee, and was ordered to be reported on Monday.

The report on the Charitable Assurances Involment Bill was brought up and the amendment agreed to.

Friday, April 15.

The Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Charitable Assurances Involment Bill was also read a third time and passed.

Monday, April 18.

The Union Relief Aid Acts Continuance Bill and the Lands Drainage (Provisional Orders) Bill were read a second time.

The Vestry Cess Abolition (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

Tuesday, April 19.

The Duke of Marlborough moved the second reading of the Land Securities Company Bill.

Lord Redesdale opposed the second reading. This was simply a money-lending company, and there was no public object involved in the measure. The transactions of such a company ought to be regulated by public law, and not by private legislation.

After some discussion,

Lord Redesdale, in withdrawing his amendment, said, if the provisions of the bill were right, they ought to pass as a public, and not as a private, measure.

The bill was read a second time.

On the report of an amendment in the Punishment of Rape Bill,

The Earl of Carnarvon moved the omission of the proviso at the end of the first clause, so as to make it a special clause in the bill, and moved to insert a clause, placing in the hands of the judge the discretionary power of whipping, where the offender was convicted of an intent to commit the crime. In doing so, the noble Earl said their Lordships would doubtless remember, that at the last stage of the bill a change was introduced, rendering it compulsory on the judges to award the punishment of whipping where a person was convicted of the crime. He was anxious to leave the discretion, as far as possible, in the hands of the judge, especially as in other respects the judge must have that discretion, and would move the amendment of which he had given notice.

After a short discussion, the amendment was agreed to, and the report was received.

The Lord Chancellor, in moving the second reading of the Improvement of Land Act (1864), explained, that it consisted of two great divisions; and the first one embodied all the provisions that had been found most beneficial in the numerous Drainage Acts; but the present bill extended very largely the purposes of those acts.

After a few words from Lord Bernal and the Marquis of Bath in approval of the principle of the measure, it was read a second time.

The Union Relief Aid Acts Continuance Bill, and the Land Drainage Provisional Orders Bill, passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday, April 15.

Sir J. Pakington asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were his intentions in regard to two subjects which were now exciting great interest. Whether he intended to introduce a bill for the amendment of the Highway Act; and whether he would bring in the bill he promised for the improvement of discipline in county and borough prisons.

Sir G. Grey said the bill regarding highways was in print, and would be soon introduced. With regard to the other measure, he was waiting to receive the report of medical men as to the dietary of borough prisons before he completed the provisions of the bill.

Mr. A. Mills asked the First Commissioner of Works whether the Government had abandoned the intention of introducing any measure for the concentration of the Courts of Justice. The owners of property on the proposed site had been kept in suspense for three years, and one owner of seventeen houses, who had previously an income of something like 2000*l.* a year, was now almost reduced to beggary by the indecision of the Government.

Mr. Cooper.—Her Majesty's Government have not abandoned the subject. It is now under consideration, and I hope will shortly be brought forward.

Mr. A. Mills.—During this session?

Mr. Cowper.—Yes.

The County Courts (Ireland) Bill passed through committee pro forma, for the insertion of amendments.

The Common-law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment Bill passed through committee.

Mr. Scholfield obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law of partnership, and the bill was introduced accordingly.

Sir C. Wood obtained leave to bring in a bill to confirm the appointment of Mr. Henry Pendock St. George Tucker, as one of the judges of her Majesty's High Court at Bombay, and to establish the validity of certain proceedings therein, and the bill was introduced.

Monday, April 18.

Mr. Disraeli moved a resolution as follows:—"Notice having been taken by a member of this House that more than four Under-Secretaries of State have been sitting and voting in this House some time during this present session; resolved, that the provisions of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, s. 4, have been violated, and that the seat of the fifth Under-Secretary of State has been and is thereby vacated."

Lord Palmerston admitted that the law had been violated, and said that he should propose the passing of a bill of indemnity.

The Attorney-General, admitting the truth of the former part of the resolution, which he could not object to being placed upon the records of the House, said he contended that the latter part, which declared the seat of the noble lord the member for North Lancashire to be vacated, was, in his opinion, entirely unwarranted by the act of Parliament, and was not supported by any legitimate inference from the language of other acts, and it did not become the House to adopt it.

Mr. Walpole supported the motion.

Sir G. Grey moved, as an amendment to the latter part of the motion, "that a select committee be appointed to inquire whether the Under-Secretary of State, who was last appointed to that office, has thereby vacated his seat."

The motion, as amended, was afterwards agreed to.

The House sat in committee upon the Penal Servitude Acts Amendment Bill.

Clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 were agreed to.

Mr. Hunt proposed to add at the end of clause 5—"If any holder of a license granted under the said Penal Servitude Acts, or any of them, who shall be at large in the United Kingdom, shall fail to report himself to the chief police station of the borough or division where he shall be on his arrival therein, and subsequently on the 1st day of each month, or shall change his locality without having previously notified the same to the police station to which he has reported himself, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and may be summarily convicted thereof, and his license shall be forthwith forfeited by virtue of such conviction."

After a debate, the committee divided—

The remaining clauses were agreed to, and the bill passed through committee.

The High Court at Bombay Bill and the Court of Chancery (Despatch of Business) Bill were read a second time.

The Common-law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

Tuesday, April 19.

Sir C. O'Loughlin moved for leave to introduce a bill to remove certain restrictions on the negotiation of promissory notes and bills of exchange under a certain amount in Ireland, in order to assimilate the law on the subject between the two countries.

The Attorney-General for Ireland, at that late hour of the night (twelve o'clock), asked to be allowed to introduce the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill, and Superior Courts of Common Law (Dublin) Bill, without a statement, reserving his remarks till the second reading; but upon an objection being raised, he did not press his motion.

The High Court at Bombay Bill passed through committee.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

ON the 15th February last Mr. Black asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government intended to bring in a bill this session for consolidating the acts relating to copyright in works of literature and art. The answer of Mr. M. Gibson was, that the Government had no present intention of bringing in such a bill, upon which Mr. Black gave notice that he would do so himself.

The bill has been introduced by Mr. Black, and the subject is one of such importance, that we think it may be useful to give its provisions at length, in order that our readers may see what these provisions are; and any of them who take a special interest in the law of copyright as it affects either literature or art, may be inclined to suggest improvements in Mr. Black's bill, where they think improvement is required.

A Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to Copyright in Works of Literature and the Fine Arts.

Whereas it is expedient that the several acts now in force relating to copyright in works of literature, the drama, music, and the fine arts, as well as the several acts relating to international copyright, should be amended and consolidated into one act: be it therefore enacted &c., as follows:—

SECT. 1. The several acts and parts of acts set forth in Schedule (A.) to this act annexed are hereby repealed to the extent to which such acts or parts of acts are by such Schedule expressed to be repealed.

2. Provided always, that notwithstanding such repeal of the said acts every copyright which shall be subsisting at the time of the passing of this act shall continue in force till the expiration of such copyright, and shall be the property of the then proprietor; and with regard to all offences or injuries committed against any such copyright before this act shall come into operation, every penalty imposed and every remedy given by the said acts in relation to any such offence or injury shall be applicable as if such acts had not been repealed: provided always, that nothing in this act contained shall affect, alter, or vary any right subsisting at the time of passing this act, except as herein expressly enacted; and also contracts, agreements, and obligations made and entered into before the passing of this act shall remain in full force.

3. All copyright under this act shall be deemed personal property, and be transferable by sale or bequest, and in case of intestacy shall be subject to the same law of distribution as other personal property, and in Scotland shall be deemed to be personal or moveable estate, and shall be vested in the original proprietor or his assigns for the time being, and such assigns shall have all the same rights and privileges attaching thereto as any original proprietor from whom such copyright may have been derived; and every assignment of copyright to which this act refers, and every license to use or copy by any means or process the design or work which shall be the subject of such copyright, shall be made by some note or memorandum in writing, to be signed by the proprietor of the copyright, or by his agent appointed for that purpose in writing.

4. The copyright in any work of literature first printed and published in the British dominions, provided the author thereof be a British subject or be resident in the British dominions, shall be vested in such author or his assigns for the periods hereafter stated in relation thereto respectively:

The copyright in books published in the lifetime of the author shall be the property of the author or his assigns during the term of the natural life of such author, and for seven years afterwards, or for forty-two years from the date of first publication if the latter be the longest term :

The copyright in books first published after the death of the author shall be the property of the proprietor of the author's manuscript and his assigns for forty-two years from the first publication thereof :

The copyright in a contribution to a periodical work, such contribution being composed for publication, and given or sold to the publisher, editor, projector, conductor, or proprietor of such periodical, shall be the property of such publisher, proprietor, conductor, editor, or projector during the author's natural life and for seven years afterwards, but without the right of publishing the same in a separate form, unless a consent in writing be previously obtained from the author of such contribution, or his assigns, which right of separate publication shall be vested in the author and his assigns after twenty-eight years from the first publication of his contribution in such periodical, or earlier if there be any contract, expressed or implied, reserving to the author such right of separate publication before the expiration of such twenty-eight years :

The copyright in books bequeathed or otherwise given by the author of the same, or his personal representative, to or in trust for the Universities or Colleges, shall be vested in the said Universities or Colleges for the period for which the same shall be bequeathed or given, or if not bequeathed to them for any limited period, so long as such books shall be printed only at their own printing presses within the said Universities or Colleges respectively, and for their sole benefit and advantage ; but the said Universities and Colleges shall have the right to sell their copyright in books so bequeathed, in which case the copyright shall endure only for the term given by this act to other books.

5. The copyright in any lecture, sermon, musical composition, or dramatic piece, first delivered, represented, or performed in the British dominions, not printed or published by the author thereof or his assigns, provided such author be a British subject or resident in the British dominions, shall be vested in the author or his assigns, together with the sole right of delivering, representing, or performing, or causing the same to be delivered, represented, or performed, and the sole right of printing and publishing the same, for the same term as is prescribed to the authors of a work of literature by this act, from the date of the first delivery, representation, or performance thereof.

6. The author of any work of fiction, or his assigns, shall, during the existence of copyright therein, have the sole right of converting the same, or any portion thereof, or causing the same, or any portion thereof, to be converted into a drama.

7. The copyright in any print, map, chart, or plan, first published within the British dominions, shall vest in the person being a British subject or resident within the British dominions, who shall have first engraved, or procured the same to be engraved, or in his assigns, for the same term as is prescribed to the authors of books by this act, to commence from the first publication thereof, provided the author's name and the date of first publication be printed on each print.

8. The author, being a British subject or resident within the British dominions, of every original sculpture, model or cast, painting, drawing, engraving, or photograph, or other work of art which shall be, or shall have been, made either in the British dominions or elsewhere, and which shall not have been sold or disposed of before the commencement of this act, shall have copyright in such works of art, and he and his assigns shall have the sole and exclusive right of copying, engraving, reproducing, and multiplying such work of art, by any means and of any size, for the same term as is provided to the authors of a work of literature by this act, provided his name and the date of publication be marked on such work of art ; provided that when any sculpture, model or cast, or any painting or drawing, or the negative of any photograph, shall for the first time after the passing of this act be sold or disposed of, or shall be made or executed for or on behalf of any other person for a good or a valuable consideration, the author or artist thereof shall not produce copies, or engravings, or photographs of the same, unless he have leave to do so, by an agreement in writing, signed by the proprietor of such work of art.

9. Nothing herein contained shall prejudice the right of any person to copy or use any work in which there shall be no copyright, or to represent any scene or object, notwithstanding that there may be copyright in some other representation of such scene or object.

10. All illustrations produced by plates, woodcuts, or other means, in any work of literature, shall be deemed a part of such work, and be the copyright of the proprietor thereof.

11. Her Majesty may, by any Order in Council, direct that the author, and his personal representatives, of any books, paintings, prints, dramatic pieces, musical compositions, articles of sculpture, engravings, and other works of art, to be defined in such Order, which shall, after a future time to be specified in such Order, be first published, produced, performed, or represented in any foreign country to be named in such Order, shall have the privilege of copyright therein, or sole liberty of representation or performance, as the case may be, within the British dominions, for the same period as is granted by this act to the authors of the like productions first published, produced, represented, or performed in the United Kingdom, unless limited to any shorter period by such Order ; and her Majesty may, by any further Order or Orders in Council, from time to time revoke, alter, or vary any such Order or Orders, or make any other Order or Orders in relation thereto, and in lieu thereof, with similar power to revoke, alter, or vary the same.

12. The author of any such book or dramatic piece to which the privilege of copyright is by Order in Council extended, and his assigns, shall, so long as such Order in Council remains in force, be empowered to prevent the publication, unless with the authority of the author, of any translation of such book, or the representation of any translation of such dramatic piece, within the British dominions, for any time specified in such Order not exceeding five years from the time at which the authorised translation of such book or dramatic piece, or each part thereof if published in parts, may be first published or publicly represented, and the author or his assigns shall have copyright in such translation during the time so specified.

13. Any article of political discussion or otherwise which has been published in any newspaper or periodical in a foreign country, to which the privilege of copyright is extended, may, if the source from which the same is taken be acknowledged, be republished or translated in any newspaper or periodical in this country, unless the author has signified his intention of preserving the copyright therein, and the right of translating the same, in some conspicuous part of the newspaper or periodical in which the same was first published, in which case the same shall, without the formalities required by this act, receive the same protection as is thereby extended to books by the provisions relating to international copyright.

14. In the event of hostilities occurring between Great Britain and any of the States with which an international treaty on copyright shall subsist, such hostilities shall not be deemed to annul or render nugatory such treaty, which shall remain in full force in time of war as in time of peace.

15. Registers for the registration of the proprietorship in any copyright of works of literature, right of representation or performance, permitted by this act to be registered according to Form No. 1 in the Schedule (B.) to this act, and also of any assignment or license affecting the same, according to Form No. 2 in Schedule (B.) to this act, shall be kept at the Hall of the Stationers Company in London by the registrar. Where the author or proprietor is not certain of the day of publication, he may insert the year only, in which case the copyright shall run from the 1st January of that year.

16. There shall also be kept at the Hall of the Stationers Company a book or books, intitled "The Register of Proprietors of Copyright in Sculpture, Paintings, Engravings, Drawings, and Photographs, and other Works of Art," wherein shall be entered a memorandum of every copyright of such works of art, and also of every subsequent assignment of any such copyright, according to the Forms No. 1 and No. 2 in the Schedule (B.) to this act ; except that the forms of entry may be varied to meet the circumstances of each case, with a short description of the nature and subject of the work registered, and in addition thereto, if the person registering shall so desire, a sketch, outline, or photograph of the said work; and no proprietor of any such copyright shall be entitled to the benefit of this act until such registration, and no action shall be sustainable nor any penalty be recoverable in respect of any infringement of copyright before registration; and that the sum to be demanded by the officer of the said Company of Stationers for making any entry of sculpture, paintings, engravings, drawings, and photographs, and other works of art, shall be 2s. 6d.

17. The registry of copyright works shall, during the official hours of business, be open to the inspection of any person on payment of 1s. for each entry searched for or inspected, or for a more general search 2s. 6d. for each year inspected; and the said registrar shall, when required during the official hours of business, give a copy of any entry in such books, certified under his hand, and impressed with the stamp of the said company, to be by them provided for such purpose, to any person requiring the same, on payment to the said registrar of the sum of 1s.; and any copy of any such entry so certified and impressed shall be received in evidence in all courts and in all summary proceedings, and shall be prima facie proof of the proprietorship or assignment of copyright, right of representation or performance, or license, as therein expressed, but subject to be rebutted by other evidence.

18. The officer appointed for registration shall furnish annually to the Comptroller of her Majesty's Stationery Office, for publication, the following particulars, viz.—

- A list of all books and literary works published in the British dominions which have been registered during the year, with the date of registration and first publication:
- A list of all assignments made during the same year of books and literary works published in the British dominions:
- A list of all foreign books and literary works registered under the International Copyright Act during the year:
- A list of all the works of art registered during the year, and assignments of the same.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS FOR MIDDLESEX PRISONS.—The magistrates of Middlesex held a meeting at their Sessions House, Clerkenwell, Mr. Pownall in the chair. The principal business before them was the question of appointing a Roman Catholic chaplain for the county gaols. Mr. P. N. Laurie, in a very lengthened speech, moved that provision be made for the regular ministration of a minister or ministers for the Roman Catholic prisoners, and that it be left with the visiting justices to define their duties, and fix the remuneration. Mr. Cox moved, as an amendment, that permission be given to a Roman Catholic clergyman to visit the prisoners of his persuasion at proper reasonable times, and at a fixed remuneration; but this amendment was negatived by a large majority. Mr. Serjeant Payne then moved another amendment, to the effect that there was no necessity for changing the system now adopted in the prisons; and on this amendment a division took place, when seventy voted for it, and only twenty-four for the original motion, which was consequently lost.

Lewis said, "He would read from Starkie on Evidence, which was known to be a standard work upon the subject, a statement of the law as applicable to the case (vide Examination as to Religious Belief, pp. 115, 116). That is a clear statement of the rule of law upon the subject."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 30, 1864.

WHATEVER opinion may be entertained with regard to the Lord Chancellor as a legislator, all persons must admit his unrivalled powers as an advocate.

If any one was ever disposed to underrate those powers, the defence of his Lordship against the onslaught of Lord Chelmsford on the Land Transfer Act, and its operation, must have shewn them their error.

The Lord Chancellor admits the limited success hitherto obtained by the act, but he attributes it to the solicitors, who, he observes, not only prophesied that the act would not work, but naturally exerted all their influence to fulfil their own predictions. His Lordship described, most humorously, the solicitor, not only as dwelling on every estate, but as sinking upon the shoulders of the proprietor, guiding and controlling him in all things—like the old man of the sea, never to be shaken off. This description evidently tickled the fancy of the House, and naturally produced cheers and laughter.

His Lordship, having pointed out how slowly certain acts, such as the Copyhold Enfranchisement Act of 1841, came into operation, prepared the House to believe that similar success might in time attend the Land Transfer Act, when its merits became known to landed proprietors, and they could no longer be hoodwinked or misled by interested parties.

We cannot but think that his remarks upon the Copyhold Enfranchisement Act of 1841 are scarcely in point, for had that act not been materially altered and amended by subsequent acts, its operation would still have been as confined as that of the Land Transfer Act.

By the act of 1841, the enfranchisement of copyholds was voluntary; by a subsequent act, the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51 (the Copyhold Act of 1852), enfranchisement may be compelled, either by the lord or the tenant, after the next admittance on or after the 1st July, 1853.

The success of the Enfranchisement Acts was undoubted after 1853, but the reason of the success was, that enfranchisement was no longer a voluntary act, but might be made compulsory either by the lord or the tenant.

Now, under the Land Transfer Act, applications for registration of title may be made by the following persons:—1, the owner of the fee-simple; 2, persons who collectively are owners of the fee-simple, or have the power of acquiring the same; 3, persons who have the power of appointing the fee-simple; 4, trustees for sale of the fee-simple; 5, the owner of the first estate of freehold, and the first vested estate of inheritance; 6, any purchaser of a fee-simple where his contract empowers him so to do, or the vendor consents; 7, any person authorised by the Court of Chancery to make such application.

The act, therefore, is not compulsory upon any one; it can only be put into operation by the owner or owners of the estate, or those who have certain powers over it. It is not likely, therefore, unless such persons feel they would derive some great benefit from so doing, that they will apply for registration.

If the Lord Chancellor had made registration compulsory on every sale after the act came into operation, at the option either of the vendor or purchaser, or if he could now by an amending act introduce such an alteration in the provisions of his measure, we might, doubtless, expect the same increase of business, and from the same cause as that which took place under the Copyhold Enfranchisement Act, after enfranchisement was rendered compulsory at the option either of the lord or the tenant; but until some such amendment takes place, the progress of the Lord Chancellor's favourite measure must, we think, be slow.

Up to the present time the only persons who seem to have taken advantage of the act, have been those who were about to sell land in lots for building purposes.

None of our large landed proprietors have yet appeared within the precincts of the land court in Lincoln's-inn-fields. What keeps them away; is it, in reality, the family solicitor—typified under the by no means complimentary figure of the old man of the sea, by our "jocund" Lord Chancellor? Is it wilful ignorance of the benefits which would be conferred upon them and their estates, by invoking the aid of the provisions of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53? Or, finally, are they well advised in keeping out of the hands of the registrar, preferring even the tender mercies of the family solicitor, and his inevitable bill, to the dread of what may be even worse?

No doubt solicitors, as a body, do not like changes in the law which affect their own interests, and in this they are not unlike the rest of the world, except perhaps, those who have always occupied, or who have attained, such a station as to render them disinterested, or, at any rate, unprejudiced against changes which do not affect themselves. We are not, therefore, surprised that solicitors generally have rather thrown their influence against, rather than in favour of, the Lord Chancellor's measure. And the Lord Chancellor, like Cromwell, may complain that the "sons of Zeruah" have been too strong for him. Perhaps they may in time be gained over by the new system of remuneration to which his Lordship alludes in his speech.

But influential as solicitors are, surely all landed proprietors are not completely under their influence. Nor are they all so ignorant, that if a great boon were offered to them which would increase the value of their estates, they would continue obstinately to refuse to accept it. We believe that landed proprietors have considered the measure, and that, with some few exceptions which we have before alluded to, they do not see that they would derive any advantage from the act. Indeed, as the act now stands, there are but few landed proprietors who can "take the benefit" of it.

In the first place, a landed proprietor cannot obtain an indefeasible title, unless it should "appear to be such as a court of equity would hold to be a valid marketable title." This reduces the number of persons who could be applicants for an indefeasible title very considerably, for the number of marketable titles—that is to say, titles which a court of equity would force upon an unwilling purchaser—is small as compared with those which are unmarketable; and the defects of which, when sold, are cured by special conditions, year by year becoming more common and more stringent.

Again: even assuming that a person has a marketable title, if his property is mortgaged (and how few properties are not mortgaged?), he cannot register his title without the production of his deeds, and this he could not do without the consent of the mortgagee, who in most cases, as he could gain nothing by it, would doubtless withhold his consent.

The number of persons, therefore, who practically can apply for an indefeasible title is very small.

What benefits would even this small number derive from it? As far as they themselves, and those claiming under them, are concerned, actually none; for, except as to persons to whom they convey as purchasers for value, or mortgagees, the title would be just as impeachable as it was before registration.

Suppose, however, that the owner of land is about to sell or mortgage it, is it worth his while to register? We think not. If he has got a marketable title, why should he put himself to a greater expense in procuring registration than he would incur by shewing his title in the ordinary way, when, if a purchaser refused to take it, he could compel him to do so by bill, unless, indeed, he could, by procuring an indefeasible title for the purchaser, obtain a larger price for his estate? It is, however, at least doubtful whether he would by so doing get a farthing more.

It is true, that if a person registered his estate prior to mortgaging it, he would, on a future transfer of the mortgage, be put, perhaps, to less expense; but against this saving (which might be very remote) must be set off the greater expense incurred in obtaining an indefeasible title, to that which would result from shewing his title in the usual manner.

We have not space at present to consider the question whether, when registration has been obtained under the act, titles would be more simple and secure, and the expense of purchases and sales diminished. It is, we think, very doubtful whether that would be the result in all, or even in the majority of cases.

As to the registration of land without an indefeasible title, it is difficult to conceive what benefit it would confer upon any one, or what person could ever be induced to apply for such registration.

The Lord Chancellor, it seems, has still confidence in his own measure; he may at some future period endeavour to improve it. In the meantime let light be thrown upon its working. Let us know what are the expenses of registering titles. We speak not merely of the cost of the short instrument by which registration is effected or witnessed, but those attendant upon the examination of the title before it can be submitted to the registrar, and he can complete the registration. Let us know in how many cases registration is refused, and what costs have been incurred in such fruitless applications, which, instead of being a benefit to the landowner, only throw a cloud upon his title.

If properties with registered titles are sold, let us know whether they do in reality produce larger prices than properties which are not registered. In fact, let us know everything fully, whether it be to the advantage or disadvantage of the act.

If the act be on the whole beneficial, not even the influence of the family solicitor will prevent its coming yearly more and more into operation, and subsequent alterations and amendments may increase its utility; but if no real advantage will accrue to landed proprietors by their applying for registration, no clever speeches in either House, no popular articles in leading journals, will induce them to accept a gift, the value of which they think problematical.

WE believe that the Lord Chancellor has prepared and will soon lay before Parliament, a bill giving equitable jurisdiction, of course to a limited extent, to the county courts.

The proposed measure is one of great importance. It is, moreover, a step in the right direction, and will go far towards effecting the fusion of law and equity. The increase, however, in the jurisdiction of the county courts must, we think, also be supplemented by those important law reforms which the Lord Chancellor has so long and so eloquently advocated. As long as the law remains in its present chaotic state, we can scarcely expect that an adequate supply of judges can be found to administer satisfactorily both law and equity in local courts, unless their jurisdiction be limited, at any rate, as regards equity, to cases of a very simple character. The judges of the superior courts, both of common law and equity, independently of their labours being confined principally to one branch of the law, are assisted very materially by an able Bar, who by great research lay before them the law applicable to the cases they decide, collected sometimes out of many hundreds of volumes. A county court judge has rarely this advantage, and when questions of law are raised before him, he must in a great measure depend upon his own resources.

If, then, additional jurisdiction is given to the county court judges, additional facilities should be afforded them, and to those who seek justice from them, of ascertaining readily what the law really is.

First, there is no valid reason why we should not have in this country (as most of our colonies and the United States have), the whole of the public statute law, well arranged in at most three or four volumes.

And, secondly, a digest of the decisions of our courts of law and equity should be made, in accordance with the Lord Chancellor's speech in the House of Lords during last session. This great work might be completed at no far distant time, if Parliament would expend half as much in the improvement of the laws as they do upon the works of art by which their two Houses are ornamented.

HUDSON v. SLADE.

THE case of Hudson v. Slade has at length come to an end. This case, it will be remembered, was an action brought by Mr. Hudson against the benchers of the Middle Temple for assault and false imprisonment.

Mr. Hudson appeared on the floor of the court, and applied for a rule calling upon the defendant to shew cause why the award of the arbitrator to whom the case was referred should not be set aside, upon the grounds—first, that it was an excess, and that the arbitrator had gone beyond the limits and powers allowed him; and, secondly, that the award was generally inconsistent. Mr. Hudson said, before he entered into the facts, he would account for the delay in applying for the rule. The award was dated the 20th October last year, and was at that time sent to his attorney in London, whilst he himself was in Australia. It was posted on to that colony, and upon receiving it he came home, and arrived in England on the 13th February last, too late to make the present application last term.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said there was a little difficulty about the matter, but the Court would not stop Mr. Hudson from making the application.

Mr. Hudson said, that of course the Court would recollect, that at the trial the jury could not agree; and ultimately it was arranged between himself and the defendants, that the case should be referred to Mr. Coleridge to settle all matters in dispute between the parties. Mr. Coleridge accordingly undertook the matter, and it was his award that he complained of as being unfair. The award ordered, that he (the plaintiff) and the defendants should accept a release of all causes of action between them within a month from that date; that he should withdraw all imputations against the defendants with respect to ungentlemanly conduct; and in consideration of his doing so, the defendants were to hand over to him the sum of 50l. He complained that that was an unfair award.

THE COURT were of opinion that no rule should be granted. An arbitrator was possessed of extraordinary powers, and they were not satisfied that Mr. Coleridge had exceeded them.—Rule refused.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, April 21.

Lord Redecliffe moved the following resolutions:—That no private bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a second time after Thursday, the 30th June next; that no bill confirming any provisional order of the Board of Health, or authorising any inclosure of lands under special report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, or for confirming any scheme of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, shall be read a second time after Thursday, the 30th June next; that when a bill shall have passed this House, with amendments, these orders shall not apply to any new bill sent up from the House of Commons which the chairman of committees shall report to the House is substantially the same as the bill so amended.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The Land Mortgage Bank of India Bill was read a second time.

The Joint-stock Companies (Foreign Countries) Bill was read a second time.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, the select committee on the Improvement of Land Act, 1884, Bill, was named.

The Union Relief Aid Acts Continuance Bill, and the Land Drainage (Provisional Orders) Bill were read a third time and passed.

Lord Chalmersford rose to call attention to certain returns which had been moved for, for the purpose of seeing whether the great expectations which had been formed of the effects of the Land Transfer Act had been realised. From those returns he found that a registrar was appointed with a salary of 2500*l.*, with an assistant registrar at 1550*l.*, a chief clerk at 400*l.*, and a second clerk at 200*l.* That was a most moderate staff for the business that had been anticipated, and he had no fault to find with the appointments. He found that since the act was passed there had been only sixty-five applications; and of these, eleven had been withdrawn, and only nine titles or estates had been registered. There were about two estates to be entered on the registry; so that he would say there were eleven titles on the registry. There were still forty-six applications on sufferance. The value of the property, so far as it could be ascertained, amounted to 1,500,000*l.*; and, besides these, nineteen applications not fully ascertained. The amount of acreage, so far as it was ascertained, amounted to 4787 acres.

Lord Chancellor.—On pending applications.

Lord Chelmsford.—A large part of the property was building land, and they seemed to realise the expectations of a noble lord, a member of the committee on the bill, who said that it would be of advantage to such noble lords as had property in the neighbourhood of towns who wished to sell it in lots for building. From the great expectations which had been put forth of 300,000 deeds being registered annually, it might be supposed that the act would be self-supporting. But such was not the case. The entire amount of fees received from the passing of the act until the 1st March was only 180*l.* The measure itself was looked upon as the great political achievement of the act of 1862; but it had turned out a great failure. This measure, which seemed to be so ardently desired for many years, was one in which the public mind had been misled, and a permanent charge was placed upon the revenue without any corresponding advantage.

The Lord Chancellor expressed his thanks to his noble and learned friend for having called attention to the subject, which had been done with his entire consent and concurrence; because he thought that the progress of new institutions should be discussed in Parliament and the country. When the present Government came into office, he framed the bill of 1862 on the views which he originally entertained, namely, the registration of the real owner. He would come now to what had been done under the act; its promises for the future, and the reasonable grounds for supposing that it would succeed, particularly when it was compared with other measures. Of the acts passed in modern times there was none more useful than the Copyhold Enfranchisement and Tithe Commutation Act of 1841. There was only one application for registration under it in the first year, 12 in the second, 29 in the third, 49 in the fourth, and yet in 1861, or twenty years after its passing, so great was its utility that the applications amounted to 786. Then, again, under the act for enabling exchanges to be made through the Inclosure Commissioners, which was passed in 1845, there were 10 applications in the first year, 14 in the second, 39 in the third, but in 1862, or only seventeen years after its passing, there were 246 applications. These instances shewed the slow growth of the institutions which were now generally adopted. In contrast therewith, under the act which came into operation in October, 1862, there had been during the sixteen months that it was in working order, and notwithstanding the most determined opposition to it on the part of the great body of the solicitors, there had been brought into court property to the value of 2,000,000*l.* This was not a failure. In a letter received from the chief registrar that very morning, that official stated that there had been additional applications for registering land, which comprised between 1700 and 1800 acres of land, and exceeding in value 130,000*l.* The obstacle to the working of the measure lay in the bad and erroneous mode of remunerating solicitors according to the length and repetition of their work. The result was, that to do justice to themselves, and to earn their bread, a system of complexity was kept up and encouraged. He (the Lord Chancellor) had obtained powers to assess a system for remunerating them under a different principle, but he had not received that assistance from the Profession which would have enabled him to accomplish this. He hoped to make another attempt, and to introduce a bill to alter the law for remunerating the solicitors. The knowledge of the present law was kept from the people, and any one asking to register his title was discouraged from the attempt. Was there any one of their Lordships who knew anything of the title to his estates? Was there not dwelling upon every estate—nay, rather sinking upon the shoulders of the proprietor—a solicitor who controlled and guided him in all things. Could he ever shake off the old man of the sea? He held in his hand a letter from a purchaser of 42 acres of land for 4000*l.*, who said that he had been desirous of having his title put upon the register, but that his solicitor said that it was against the spirit and the law of his caste, and that he could not concur in the application. The consequence was, that the gentleman went himself, and he had given him (the Lord Chancellor) the details of the whole amount which he had to pay for the registration of his title to this land, which was likely to be let for building, and the whole expense of putting the title upon the register, and emancipating the land and owners for ever from all parchments and mystifications, was 29*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* Let any one of their Lordships run up in his memory the sums which he paid his solicitor from year to year. The solicitor was the familiar of every estate, and what an enormous amount of taxation and burthens was the consequence? This was by no means necessary; all that was wanted was, that the title should be examined, and the result of the examination stamped, and the consequence of the examination recorded, and the record continued in a simplified manner, so as to prevent the perplexity, complexity, and intricacy which resulted from the present system; and then the title would become simple, transparent, clear, and certain, in the same manner as that to funds, railway stock, and ships. That this measure had been a failure he utterly denied; that it would be a failure he ventured to anticipate was impossible. He had had the good fortune to assist in some measures of legal reform, and to originate others; but if there was anything upon which he could put his finger, by which he hoped that he should be hereafter remembered, it was this particular measure. He would venture to trouble their Lordships with only a few words more. He held in his hand a well-conducted paper, which represented the opinions of solicitors, in which it was said—"This (the different mode of remuneration) must be borne in mind when the scale of costs comes to be settled, for if it be not, it will be so much the worse for the chance of this new legal department, so far as the amount of its business is concerned." Those who thus prophesied had the means of fulfilling their own predictions; and this to a great extent was the cause of the measure being so slowly carried into effect.

Lord Cranworth did not think that this measure, having been in existence only about sixteen months, could yet be pronounced a failure. If his noble and learned friend could succeed in framing any measure to institute a more rational mode of remunerating solicitors, it would be worth all the bills upon this subject; but he must express very great doubt whether such a measure was possible.

The Duke of Montrose referred to an act some years since passed with the view of shortening documents of title in Scotland, which was practically a dead letter, owing to the lawyers telling their clients that the short deed was not satisfactory, and that they had better have everything recapitulated. This shewed how hard it was to bring about a change of this sort. As to registration of titles, he must say that that worked remarkably well in Scotland.

Lord Overstone quite concurred in the importance of this act; and he thought, if the Lord Chancellor would consent to the publication of the title prepared under the new statute to which he had referred, it would do more than anything else to render the measure intelligible, and to produce a conviction of the desirability of acting upon it.

The Lord Chancellor said, he should be most happy to assent to the publication of the document, but as it was an actual title, it must be understood that, of course, the names of parties and of places would not be printed. He might, however, observe, that the short document was the result of an examination of a title the abstract of which occupied 150 sheets.

Friday, April 23.

The Earl of Ellenborough laid upon the table a bill for the amendment of the law relating to sentences of death. He thought it inexpedient that the final decision in cases of so much importance should be cast upon the sole responsibility of the Home Secretary, and that, where the life of any man was concerned, it should depend upon the peculiar temperament of any particular man. Looking back to his own official experience, now extending over a period of more than thirty-five years, he remembered when the recorder of the city of London presented his report of the capital cases for the decision of the Government. In these cases, all the principal members of the Government, including the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, were summoned to attend the King, who presided on the occasion. He himself remembered George IV being present on one occasion, and he had no recollection that, under any circumstances, there was any distrust expressed at that time with respect to their decisions. On the contrary, they appeared to give general satisfaction. This course of proceeding continued until the accession of her present Majesty. It was then deemed advisable that a youthful female Sovereign should not be present to adjudicate concerning certain crimes then capitally punishable. He remembered sitting beside the Duke of Wellington when a bill, giving effect to those views, was introduced into that House, and though the noble duke admitted the necessity of such a measure, yet he deeply regretted the necessity for a change in the course of procedure which had existed for so many years. The penalty of death no longer attached to many of these crimes. He did not wish to place any additional labour upon the Sovereign, but he thought it would be expedient to place the law in such a position, that whenever the life of a subject was concerned, the final decision should rest with a body of persons selected from the Privy Council, and not, as at present, with the Home Secretary alone. The bill proceeded on the principle of the revival of the ancient practice to which he had referred. He trusted that the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and other members of her Majesty's Government, if they approved of the principle of the bill, would take it under their charge.

The bill was then read a first time.

The Marquis of Clanricarde called attention to the first report of the Commissioners of Inquiry into the English and Irish Courts of Common Law and Chancery.

Earl Granville was understood to say that a bill had already been prepared, embodying the recommendations of the commission, and the Attorney-General for Ireland had given notice of his intention to introduce it in the other House. The greater part of the returns had been already made, but this being the first year of their preparation, some delay had occurred on the part of some of the officers. He confidently expected that they would all be published about the middle of June.

Tuesday, April 26.

Lord Redesdale moved the second reading of the Mortgage Debentures Bill, which, he said, had been, at the suggestion of several of their lordships, changed from a private into a public bill.

After a few observations from the Duke of Marlborough, Lord Taunton, and from Lord Redesdale in reply, the bill was read a second time, and referred to a select committee.

The Joint-stock Companies (Foreign Countries) Bill, whose object is to give to companies which have transactions abroad power to use a corporate seal, passed through committee.

Lord Chelmsford called attention to the case of The Tuscaloosa. After a debate of considerable length the Lord Chancellor said, that new instructions were under consideration, which would be generally circulated through our colonial harbours.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, April 21.

Mr. Selwyn asked the First Commissioner of Works whether her Majesty's Government intended to accept the offer made by the Society of Lincoln's-inn in 1859, and since repeated, viz. either to give the ground necessary for the erection of courts for the Vice-Chancellors, or to build such courts at the expense of the society upon receiving, for a term of years, 4l. per cent. per annum on the actual outlay on the buildings from the Suitors' Fund, but without any charge upon, or guarantee from, the national exchequer.

Sir F. Kelly asked whether it was a part of the scheme which her Majesty's Government had in view to erect one large building in the metropolis for the purposes of the law courts generally.

Mr. Cowper said the proposal that was made in 1859 for the erection of the Vice-Chancellors' Courts within the precincts of Lincoln's-inn was, he understood, for the benefit of the inn itself rather than for the public, as it would no doubt enhance the value of chambers in Lincoln's-inn, because he understood it would not be so advantageous to the suitors at large or the profession as the scheme which he proposed for the concentration of all the offices in one building. He believed it was on those grounds that Lord Derby's Government refused the offer when it was made to them, and her Majesty's present Government had also refused it, and for the same reasons. The scheme proposed by her Majesty's Government was to bring together under one roof, or in their immediate contiguity, all the courts of law.

Sir F. Kelly asked when the measure would be brought forward.

Mr. Cowper said it was now under consideration, and would be brought forward in a few days.

The High Court at Bombay Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill, the Fish Teinds (Scotland) Bill, and the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Bill were severally passed through committee.

The Charitable Assurances Inrolments Bill was read a second time.

The Bridges (Ireland) Bill was defeated in committee by 128 to 85.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved the following members as the select committee on Government annuities:—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Sotherton Eastcourt, Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Henley, Sir Minto Farquhar, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Horsfall, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Charles Turner, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Hodgkinson, and Mr. Paget.

Agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Gregory, a return was ordered of all civil bill ejectments entered at the suit of the Law Life Society before the chairmen of quarter sessions of the county of Mayo and the county of Galway, from Hilary quarter sessions, 1852, up to the present time, distinguishing the ejectments of each year.

Friday, April 22.

Mr. M'Mahon asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland when the Brehon laws, now in course of arrangement and translation, would be published.

Sir R. Peel said that the transcript of the translation was complete. One volume would be published forthwith, and the other volume would appear as speedily as possible.

Mr. Hunt asked the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he would postpone the Penal Servitude Bill from Monday next to some future day.

Monday, April 25.

The Civil Courts (Ireland) Bill, which was read a second time before the Easter recess, was recommitted, in order to consider various amendments which had been introduced, as to results of suggestions from the high sheriffs and grand juries, to whom it had been sent for the purpose of eliciting their opinions on its proposed enactments.

The Attorney-General for Ireland explained the nature of these alterations, which were chiefly of a technical character, and relating to matters of detail.

Several new clauses were agreed to, and the bill passed through committee.

The Court of Chancery (Dispatch of Business) Bill passed through committee.

Mr. Scholsfield, in moving the second reading of the Partnership Law Amendment Bill, observed that it was the same in principle as that which last year passed through the House, and was sent up to the Lords, though too late to be passed into law. The difficulty which the bill proposed to remedy was this:—At the present moment there were only two modes by which a capitalist desirous of assisting a mercantile concern could do so. He must either lend his money at a fixed rate of interest, or he must become a partner, and thus expose to possible risk his entire property. The bill proposed that in future a capitalist might join a firm as a limited partner, upon the condition that he should publicly state, upon a register to be kept for that purpose, the amount he had advanced, the terms upon which the advance had been made, and various other matters named in the measure. The bill was emphatically a creditors' bill. At present a loan to a firm was a secret affair. They were given credit for ample capital, but when they became unfortunate it was found that the capital had been borrowed, and the lender swept away the greater part of the estate. The present bill would not at all alter the law of partnership qua those who were held out as partners, and the only person whose liability would be limited was one of whom the creditors knew nothing, except that his name was upon the register for a limited amount. The principle was by no means new, for in 1851 a committee of the House reported in favour of it, and in 1854 the present Solicitor-General carried a resolution to the same effect. If the bill should be allowed to go into committee, he would then explain more fully its details.

Mr. Hubbard moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

After a debate, the bill was read a second time, without a division.

The Charitable Assurances Inrolment Bill, which came down from the Lords, passed through committee.

The Lord Advocate's name was added to the select committee on the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. Locke gave notice of a motion for the addition of the name of Mr. Roebuck to the same committee; and Mr. Whiteside intimated that he would also move that the hon. member for the city of Dublin (Mr. Vance) be added to it.

Mr. Hassard intimated his intention to retire from the committee, on account of his time being otherwise occupied. It was accordingly agreed that he should be discharged from service.

The Attorney-General for Ireland moved for leave to introduce a bill to alter the constitution, and amend the practice and course of proceeding in the High Court of Chancery of Ireland.

After a debate of some length, Mr. P. Hennessy moved the adjournment of the debate; but, after some further discussion, the motion for adjournment was withdrawn, and leave was given to bring in the bill, upon the understanding that it should be read a second time on Thursday fortnight.

Tuesday, April 26.

Mr. Scholefield called the attention of the House to the report of the select committee on Standing Orders (18th March, 1864), on the case of the Sheffield, Chesterfield, and Staffordshire Bill, and moved, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Standing Orders of this House, and of the act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 20, which regulate the deposit of money, or of public securities, with the Courts of Chancery in England and Ireland, and of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, in respect of works and undertakings requiring the authority of Parliament by private bills." The House was fully aware of the Standing Order for the deposit of money, and also that there was reason to believe the order was evaded; but this was the first case in which it had come officially to the knowledge of the committee, and they in consequence considered it of so important a nature as to require the attention of the House. It had been discovered that this company had not made the necessary deposit from their own capital, but that it had been done for them on certain conditions which the hon. and learned gentleman the member for Cambridge University had discovered in the Court of Chancery.

Mr. Hodgson suggested that something should be done to facilitate the withdrawal of the deposits from the office of the Accountant-General in Chancery, and also to lessen the expenses attending it.

Mr. Selwyn said, that, without mentioning names, he would read the document referred to, but, if necessary, he would place it in the hands of the Speaker, or the officers of the House. The agreement was to the following effect:—That, in consequence of the advance and deposit of the sum of 10,400*l.* at the office of the Accountant-General in Chancery, in the names of A. and B., the parliamentary deposit on the above railway, the proposed company undertook, in case the money was not repaid before the third reading of the bill in the House of Lords, to withdraw or cause the bill to be withdrawn, and to do all that was necessary to obtain the withdrawal of the money. To that was added an agreement between the solicitors of the company and the parliamentary agents, that in pursuance of the above arrangement the sum deposited should be paid or satisfactorily secured to the bank, before the bill was read a third time in the House of Lords. The effect of those agreements was, as the House would see, for third parties, which might be called the "fourth estate," to set aside the authority of Parliament, although a committee might have so far determined that the scheme before Parliament was for the public advantage. He expressed a hope, that so long as they retained the Standing Orders, they would take care they were adequate and effectual for the purposes for which they were required.

After some remarks from Mr. Hadfield, the motion was agreed to.

The select committee on the Copyright Bill was nominated.

Wednesday, April 27.

Mr. Neodigate moved the second reading of his Church Rates Commutation Bill, but, after some debate, the second reading was negatived by 160 to 60, and the bill was therefore lost.

Sir J. Hay moved the second reading of the Bank Notes (Scotland) Bill, but, after a debate, the bill was withdrawn.

Mr. Massey brought up the report of the committee on the seat of the last-appointed Under-Secretary of State, in which they declared, that, in their opinion, that seat had not been vacated.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

(Concluded from p. 148).

19. The author of or proprietor of the copyright in any book or periodical work or of any dramatic piece or musical composition, whether British or foreign, or of any work of art to which the privilege of copyright extends, and his assigns, may require an entry thereof to be made in the register, by presenting to the registrar a request for that purpose according to the Form No. 3 of Schedule (B.) to this act, and on payment to the registrar of the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* in respect of such book or work of art, and 1*s.* if first published in any foreign country; provided that in all cases of periodical works it shall be sufficient for the provisions of this act if the first part, number, or volume be so entered and registered.

20. In case of any assignment by the registered proprietor of the whole or any portion of his interest in any copyright, right of representation or performance, the assignee, with the consent of such registered proprietor, may require an entry thereof to be made in the register by presenting to the registrar a request and concurrence in the Form No. 4 of Schedule (B.) to this act, and on payment of the fee of 2*s.* 6*d.* to the registrar; and any entry made in pursuance thereof shall operate as a legal assignment, be free from stamp duty, and have the same force as an assignment by deed.

21. In order to entitle to the protection of this act the translation of any original work (including articles in any newspaper or periodical, and afterwards published in a separate form), first published in any foreign country to which the privilege of copyright in Great Britain is extended, the author of such original work must cause the same to be registered in manner above prescribed within three months after first publication thereof in such foreign country, and such translation must be so registered within three months after its publication.

22. If the registrar refuse or neglect to enter in the register any copyright work entitled to registry under this act, or any assignment which he is required to enter, or to give any certified copy of any entry therein, on demand being made by the person entitled to demand such registry or certified copy, the fee for the same being first tendered to the registrar, he shall forfeit the sum of 20*l.* for each such refusal or neglect.

23. Every entry made in pursuance of this act of any first publication shall be prima facie evidence of a rightful first publication, but subject to be rebutted by other evidence; and if any person shall wilfully make, or cause to be made, any false entry in the register, or shall wilfully produce, or cause to be tendered in evidence, any paper falsely purporting to be a copy of any entry in the said register, he shall be guilty of an indictable misdemeanour, and shall be punished accordingly.

24. The publisher of every book published in the British dominions shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, one printed copy of the whole of the first edition, together with all maps, prints, or other engravings belonging thereto, or of any second or subsequent edition if the first or some preceding edition shall not have been delivered, and of every subsequent edition which shall contain additions or alterations, the same to be finished and coloured in the same manner as the best co-piece of the same, whether bound, sewed, or stitched together, shall be published, and upon the best paper on which the same shall be printed, at the British Museum within the times hereinafter mentioned in relation thereto respectively:—

If the first publication, sale, or exposure for sale be within the bills of mortality, within one month thereafter:

If the first publication, sale, or exposure for sale be in any other part of the United Kingdom, within three months thereafter:

If the first publication, sale, or exposure for sale be in any other part of the British dominions, within twelve months thereafter.

25. The publisher of every book published in the British dominions shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, at Stationers Hall four printed copies of the whole of the first edition, together with all maps, prints, or other engravings belonging thereto, or of any second or subsequent edition if the first or any preceding edition shall not have been delivered, and of every subsequent edition which shall contain additions or alterations, the same to be finished and coloured in the same manner as the greater portion of the impression of the same, whether bound, sewed, or stitched together, shall be published:—

Such delivery of such four copies at Stationers Hall to be for transmission to and deposit at the following libraries:—viz. of one copy to the Bodleian Library at Oxford, one copy to the Public Library at Cambridge, one copy to the Library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh, and one copy to the Library of the College of the Holy and Undivided Trinity of Queen Elizabeth, near Dublin, within one month after demand in writing, under the hand of the person duly authorised by the said Company of Stationers, or by the librarian of any of the said libraries, or by any other person thereto authorised by the librarians of the said libraries, to demand and receive the same; provided that such demand shall be left at the place of abode of the publisher of such book within twelve months after its first publication:

If any publisher shall be desirous of delivering the copy of any book so demanded on behalf of any of the said libraries at such library, it shall be lawful for him to deliver the same free of expense at such library to the officer appointed for such purpose, and such delivery shall be held as equivalent to, and accepted in lieu of, delivery to the aforesaid officer of the Stationers Company.

26. The author of any book, or of any dramatic piece or musical composition, if printed or published in any foreign country to which the privilege of copyright is extended, and of any translation thereof, shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, to the registrar one copy of the whole, whether in one or more volumes, of every such work, together with all maps and prints relating thereto, one copy of the whole of every second or subsequent edition thereof which shall contain any addition or alterations, and one copy of every print or engraving; and with regard to such translation shall also deliver to the said registrar one copy of the original work from which such translation is made, with a notification on the title page or if published in parts, on the title page of the first part, or if no title page on some conspicuous part of the work, of his intention to reserve the right of translation; and one copy of every such translation, and every such original work intended for translation, shall be so delivered within three months after the first publication thereof in the foreign country, and the translation thereof within twelve months afterwards, unless published in parts, in which case each part of such original work shall be delivered within three months after its publication, and the translation of each part within twelve months after delivery of the part of which it is a translation.

27. All such deliveries as aforesaid shall be made between the hours of ten o'clock in the forenoon and four o'clock in the afternoon of any days except Sundays, and such other days as are at the said places of delivery duly appointed to be observed and kept as public holidays, to the officer duly appointed at such places to receive the same, and which officer shall give receipts in writing for the copies so delivered to him, and be responsible for the due deposit thereof within one month thereafter in the several places for which they are delivered, and such receipts shall be sufficient proof of such delivery.

28. If any publisher of any such book, or of any second or subsequent edition required by this act to be delivered, shall neglect to deliver the same, pursuant to this act, he shall forfeit for every such default, besides the value of such copy of the book or edition which he ought to have delivered, a sum not exceeding 5*l.*, to be recovered by the librarian or other officer (properly authorised) of the library for the use whereof such copy should have been delivered, in a summary way, on conviction before two justices of the peace for the county or place where the publisher making default shall reside, or by action of debt or other proceeding of the like nature, at the suit of such librarian or other officer, in any court of record in the United Kingdom, in which action, if the plaintiff or defendant shall obtain a verdict, he shall recover the costs reasonably incurred, to be taxed as between attorney and client.

29. The registered proprietor of the copyright in any book first printed and published in the British dominions, or in any foreign country to which the privilege of copyright is extended, and of any work of art which shall be registered after the passing of this act, or his agent, may give to the Commissioners of her Majesty's Customs notice in writing of such copyright, such notice to be in the Form No. 5 of Schedule (B.) to this act, and to contain the particulars specified therein so far as they are applicable, together with a copy of the entry of the registry of such book or work of art, duly certified by and under the hand of the registrar, and for which certified copy such registrar shall be entitled to the fee of 1*s.*

30. The said commissioners shall cause to be made and publicly exposed at the custom-house of the several ports in the United Kingdom printed lists of all books and works of art of which such notice shall be given to them as aforesaid, and also from time to time deliver to the Board of Trade so many copies of such lists as such board may require, for transmission to her Majesty's possessions abroad, for public exposure there, at such places and in such manner as the Board of Trade may direct: provided always, that at the expiration of forty-two years from the date of publication of any book or work of art inserted in the same lists the said commissioners shall cause it to be struck out of the said lists, unless the proprietor of the copyright shall then give further notice that the author is still alive, or has died within seven years; and if such further notice of the author's being alive be not renewed at the expiration of each succeeding twelve months the book shall be struck off the lists at the end of seven years from the last further notice.

As to protection of copyright, and remedies against piracy:

31. The importation into the British dominions of pirated copies of any book or any work of art included in the lists prescribed by sect. 29 shall be prohibited, unless imported with the sanction or authority in writing of the proprietor or other person upon whose notice such book or work of art shall have been inserted in such lists; and all copies imported contrary hereto shall be forfeited, and may be seized by an officer of customs or inland revenue, and shall become the property of the proprietor, and be delivered to him, if claimed by him within three months after such seizure, and if not so claimed shall be destroyed; and the importer thereof, if such copy be imported for sale, shall forfeit the penalty of not more than 5*l.* in respect of every pirated copy so imported, to be sued for and recovered by the said proprietor in manner hereinafter prescribed.

32. In any case where the custom-house officer has reason to believe that any package contains any such pirated books or works of art, he may detain such package (but shall not detain a traveller's personal luggage) till he has given notice (which he is hereby authorised to do) to any of the publishers of such books or works of art whose copyright he has reason to believe has been infringed thereby, or to any person whom such publishers may appoint, for the purpose of examining such imported copies, and if proved to be piracies such package and its contents shall be forfeited, and the importer thereof shall be subject in penalty in manner mentioned in the immediately preceding clause.

33. If any person shall deem himself aggrieved by any entry made under colour of this act in the said register, or by the insertion of any literary works, painting, drawing, photograph, or other work of art in the aforesaid lists, it shall be lawful for any judge at chambers, on the application of the person so complaining, to issue a summons calling upon the person upon whose notice such book or work of art shall have been entered in the said register or inserted in the said lists, as the case may be, to appear before such judge, at a time to be appointed in such summons, to shew cause why such entry in the said register should not be expunged or varied, or why such insertion in the said lists should not be expunged; and such judge shall at the time so appointed proceed to hear and determine upon the matter of such summons, and make an order therein (in writing): provided always, that if such application relate to a wrongful first publication of which any party has availed himself to obtain an entry in the said register of a spurious work, and it shall appear to such judge with respect to such wrongful publication, if in a country to which the author or first publisher does not belong, and between which and this country no treaty of international copyright subsists, that the party making the application was the author or first publisher, as the case requires, or with respect to such wrongful first publication, either in the country where a rightful first publication has taken place, or between which and this country a treaty of international copyright does subsist, that a court of competent jurisdiction in any such country where such wrongful first publication has taken place has given judgment in favour of the right of the party claiming to be the author or first publisher, such judge shall make an order for expunging or varying the entry complained of, such order, in any of the foregoing cases, to be made with or without costs, as to such judge shall seem just; and upon service of such order, or a certified copy thereof, upon the said registrar, if the same shall relate to any entry in the said register, or upon the Commissioners of Customs, or their secretary for the time being, if the same shall relate to any insertion in the said lists, the said registrar shall expunge, vary, or confirm the said entry, or the said commissioners shall expunge such book from the said lists, or retain the same therein, according to the tenor of such order; and in case such book or work of art shall be expunged from such lists in pursuance of any such order, the prohibition imposed by this act in respect of the importation of such book or work of art shall thenceforth cease. If at the time appointed in any such summons the person so summoned shall not appear before such judge, then, upon proof by affidavit that such summons, or a true copy thereof, has been personally served on or left at the last known or usual place of abode of the person so summoned, or transmitted by post to him at such last known place of abode, or, in case the person to whom such summons was directed and his place of abode cannot be found, that due diligence has been used to ascertain the same, such judge shall be at liberty to proceed ex parte to hear and determine the matter; but if either party be dissatisfied with such order, he may apply to the superior court of which such judge is a member to review such order, and make such further order thereon as such court may see fit; and the remedies provided by this section shall be applicable to any entry made in the register book of Stationers Hall, and of any insertion in any such lists publicly exposed by the Commissioners of Customs, prior to the passing of this act.

34. If any person, not being the proprietor of the copyright in any work of literature or work of art wherein such copyright shall be subsisting shall, without the authority in writing of such proprietor, knowingly import, sell, publish, or expose, or have in his possession for sale or hire, in any part of the British dominions, any pirated copy of such work, he shall forfeit the same, and also the sum of 5s. in respect of every such copy to the proprietor of the copyright; and every person who shall have in his possession the stereotype plates of any pirated book, the plate upon which any pirated copy of any print, chart, or map may be engraved, or any mould or die for the manufacture of pirated copies of any sculpture, model, or cast, shall forfeit the same to the said proprietor; or if any person, not being the proprietor for the time being of copyright in any engraving, print, painting, drawing, or photograph, shall, without the consent of such proprietor, repeat, copy, colourably imitate, or otherwise multiply for sale, hire, exhibition, or distribution, or import into any part of the United Kingdom, any copy or imitation of the said work, for every such offence he shall forfeit to the proprietor of the copyright a sum not exceeding 10l.; and all such repetitions, copies, and imitations made without such consent as aforesaid, and all negatives of photographs made for the purpose of obtaining such copies, shall be forfeited to the proprietor of the copyright.

35. No person shall do or cause to be done any or either of the following acts—that is to say,

First, no person shall fraudulently sign or affix to or upon any painting, drawing, or photograph, or the negative thereof, any name, initials, or monogram of a person who did not execute or make such work, or offer the same for sale, exhibition, or distribution:

Secondly, no person shall fraudulently utter or dispose of any copy or colourable imitation of any painting, drawing, or photograph, or negative of a photograph, whether there shall be subsisting copyright therein or not, as having been made or executed by the author or maker of the original work from which such copy or imitation shall have been taken:

Thirdly, where the author or maker of any painting, drawing, or photograph, or negative of a photograph, made either before or after the passing of this act, shall have sold or otherwise parted with the possession of such work, if any alteration shall afterwards be made therein by any other person, by addition or otherwise, no person shall be at liberty, during the life of the author or maker of such work, without his consent, to make or knowingly to sell or publish, or offer for sale, such work, or any copies of such work, so altered as aforesaid, or of any part thereof, as or for the unaltered work of such author or maker.

Every offender under this section shall, upon conviction, forfeit to the person aggrieved a sum not exceeding 10l., or not exceeding double the full price, if any, at which all such copies, engravings, imitations, or altered works shall have been sold or offered for sale; and all such copies, engravings, imitations, or altered works shall be forfeited to the person, or the assigns or legal representatives of the person, whose name, initials, or monogram shall be so fraudulently signed or affixed thereto, or to whom such spurious or altered work shall be so fraudulently or falsely ascribed as aforesaid: provided always, that the penalties imposed by this section shall not be incurred unless the person whose name, initials, or monogram shall be so fraudulently signed or affixed, or to whom such spurious or altered work shall be so fraudulently or falsely ascribed as aforesaid, shall have been living at or within twenty years next before the time when the offence may have been committed.

36. Any person who shall represent or perform any copyright dramatic piece or musical composition, or anything bearing the same title or purporting to be the same, without the consent of the author or proprietor of the sole right of representing or performing the same, during the continuance of such right, shall forfeit to such author or proprietor the sum of 40s., or the full amount of the benefit or advantage arising from each such representation or performance, or the amount of the injury or loss sustained by such author or proprietor, for whichever he shall elect to proceed or sue, together with the costs of such proceeding or suit.

37. If any person shall during the term of copyright in any lecture or sermon, without the leave of the author thereof or his assigns, by any means obtain or make a copy thereof, or print or publish the same in any public newspaper or otherwise, or shall sell or publicly expose any copy thereof for sale, knowing the same to have been obtained or printed or published without such leave as aforesaid, every person so offending shall forfeit to the author or his assigns every such pirated copy found in his possession, and 5s. for every sheet thereof.

38. Any penalty or forfeiture imposed by this act for infringement of any copyright protected by this act, and given to the proprietor of the copyright in respect of which the same is incurred, may be prosecuted for or recovered by such proprietor, together with costs of recovering the same, summarily, before any justice of the peace or magistrate for the county or place in which the offence shall have been committed, or in which the offender shall reside, and in Scotland before any sheriff of the county, whose award shall be final, but without prejudice to any right of action which the proprietor may or might otherwise have had for any damages consequent on this or any other infringement of his privilege of copyright; and any damages which such proprietor may sustain from any infringement of his privilege of copyright may be sued for by action at law, to be brought by him in any court having jurisdiction in that part of the British dominions in which the offence shall have been committed or the offender shall reside; and in every such proceeding, if it relate to the right of representation or performance of any dramatic piece or musical composition, it shall be sufficient for the plaintiff to state that he has the sole right, without stating that it is subject to any right which he could or may have given to any other person, not being the defendant, to represent or perform the same. In any action at law for damages the defendant, on pleading thereto, shall give to the plaintiff a notice in writing of any objection on which he means to rely on the trial thereof; and if he assert that the plaintiff is not the author or first publisher of such literary work or work of art, or the proprietor of the copyright therein, or that some other person was so, he shall specify in such notice the name of such other person, together with the title of the literary work or description of the work of art, and the time and place of first publication thereof; otherwise he shall not, at the trial or hearing of such action, be allowed to give evidence that the plaintiff was not the author or first publisher of the literary work or work of art, or the proprietor of the copyright therein, or that any other person was so; nor shall any objection be allowed to be made or taken by or for the defendant which shall not have been stated in such notice; and on a verdict being given for the plaintiff he shall be entitled to recover his full costs; and if any action or suit shall be commenced or brought against any person for doing or causing to be done anything in pursuance of this act, the defendant in such action may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence; and if upon such action a verdict shall be given for the defendant, or the plaintiff shall become nonsuited or discontinued his action, then the defendant shall have and recover his full costs, for which he shall have the same remedy as any defendant has by law in any other case. And all actions, suits, bills, indictments, or informations for any offences against this act shall be brought, sued, and commenced within twelve months next after such offence committed, or else the same shall be void; provided that such limitation of time shall not extend or be construed to extend to any actions, suits, or other proceedings which, under the authority of this act, shall or may be brought, sued, or commenced for or in respect of any copies or books to be delivered for the use of the British Museum.

39. The proprietor of the copyright in any work of literature or art shall not be entitled to maintain any action or suit at law or in equity, or any summary proceeding, in respect of any infringement of such copyright, unless he shall before commencing such action have registered the same in manner prescribed for that purpose; nor shall the proprietor of any translation of any dramatic piece be entitled to such protection or benefit unless such translation be published within three months after the registration of the work of which it is a translation: provided always, that the omission to register any work of literature or art shall not affect the copyright therein of the proprietor thereof, nor shall such omission as to any dramatic piece prejudice the remedies which the proprietor of the right of representation thereof may have by virtue of this act.

40. In case the Legislature or proper legislative authorities in any British possession shall make due provision for securing or protecting the rights of British authors and artists in such possessions, by any act or ordinance, duly approved of by her Majesty for that purpose, her Majesty may, if she think fit, thereupon issue an Order in Council declaring that so long as the provisions of such act or ordinance continue in force within such possession the prohibitions and provisions contained in this or any other act relating to or for the privilege of copyright shall be suspended, so far as regards such possession, and thereupon such act or ordinance shall come into operation, except so far as may be otherwise provided therein, or as may be otherwise directed by such Order in Council: provided always, that no such act or ordinance shall be construed to authorise the importation into the United Kingdom of any pirated copies of any work wherein copyright may be subsisting in the United Kingdom, and if such pirated copies shall be brought into the United Kingdom, they shall be forfeited and destroyed, or returned to the British possession from which they shall have been imported, as the Commissioners of Customs may direct.

41. When her Majesty shall have issued any Order or Orders in Council under the authority of this act, her Majesty may, from time to time, revoke the whole or any part thereof by any further order.

42. Every Order in Council issued under the authority of the act, or to give effect to any colonial act or ordinance relating to copyright, duly approved by her Majesty, shall, within fourteen days after the issuing thereof, be twice published in the London Gazette.

43. A copy of every Order in Council issued under the authority of this act, and of every such act or ordinance, together with the Order in Council thereon, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within six weeks after issuing of such order, if Parliament be then sitting, and if not then within six weeks after the commencement of the next session of Parliament.

44. To provide against the suppression of books of importance to the public, the Judicial Committee of her Majesty's Privy Council, on complaint made to them that the proprietor of the copyright in any book, after twenty-five years from the date of its first publication, or after the death of its author, has refused to republish or to allow the republication thereof, whereby such book may be withheld from the public, may grant a license to such complainant to publish such book, in such manner and subject to such conditions as they may think fit, and such complainant may publish such book accordingly.

45. Nothing in this or any other act relating to copyright shall prevent the importation into the United Kingdom, for deposit in the library of the British Museum, of single copies of any books which may consist in part of matter in which any copyright may subsist in the British dominions, provided the same contain other and original matter.

46. This act shall extend to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and to every part of the British dominions, including the Islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, and Sark, and shall be registered in the Royal Courts of the Islands of Guernsey and Jersey respectively, and the said Royal Courts respectively shall have full power and authority and are hereby required to register the same.

47. This act shall come into operation on the day of the passing of this act; and in citing it in other acts of Parliament and in legal instruments, it shall be sufficient to use the expression "The Copyright Consolidation Act, 1864."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 7, 1864.

As we have given in a previous number (ante, p. 104) a concise account of the case of The Alexandra, stating the argument for and against the Crown, and the grounds of the differing judgments of the barons of the Exchequer, we think it may be convenient to follow the same course with reference to the appeals to the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords, and shew, shortly, how the hope that the Foreign Enlistment Act would have a construction put upon it by our highest court of judicature has been unfortunately defeated.

It will be remembered that the Chief Baron declined to sign the bill of exceptions which was tendered to him by the Attorney-General, on the ground that it did not correctly state his direction to the jury. When the present Attorney-General applied to the Court of Exchequer for a new trial, the question whether there was an appeal from the decision of that Court upon the rule was mooted, and rules were made, pursuant to the provisions of the 26th section of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, which rules will be found in 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 393, and were intended to create the right of appeal. Now, this 26th section of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act is thus worded:—

"It shall be lawful for the Lord Chief Baron and two or more barons of the Court of Exchequer from time to time to make all such rules and orders as to the process, practice, and mode of pleading of the revenue side of the court, and as to the allowance of costs, and for the effectual execution of the act, and the intention and objects thereof, as may seem to them necessary and proper; and also from time to time, by any such rule or order, to extend, apply, or adapt any of the provisions of the Common-law Procedure Act, 1852, and the Common-law Procedure Act, 1854, and any of the rules of pleading and practice on the plea side of the said court, to the revenue side of the said court, as may seem to them expedient for making the process, practice, and mode of pleading on the revenue side of the said court as nearly as may be uniform with the process, practice, and mode of pleading on the plea side of the said court."

The argument and decisions turned upon the meaning of these words "process, practice, and mode of pleading." The counsel for the Crown contending, that proceedings in error are a part of the "process, practice, and mode of pleading" of the Court—that, inasmuch, as by sect. 20 of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act power is expressly given to either party to tender a bill of exceptions on the trial of any issue, it must have been intended that the provisions of the two Common-law Procedure Acts as to appeals should, in the discretion of the barons of the Exchequer, be also applicable to revenue cases; that it must be considered that the Legislature—not the Court of Exchequer—had made these rules; that the Legislature had the power to create an appeal under the 26th section; and that "practice" included all the proceedings by which a cause is brought to judgment and execution. On the other hand, the counsel for the defendants argued, that "the creating an appeal" cannot be regulating "the process, practice, and mode of pleading of the Court;" that those words could not give, as according to the contention of the other side they must give, to a bare majority of the barons of the Exchequer, authority to legislate for the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords; and, in short, that the words on which the question arose, referred only to the proceedings of the Court of Exchequer itself.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber was composed of the Chief Justice and the puisne judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, and of the Chief Justice and two puisne judges of the Court of Common Pleas; and singularly enough all the members of the former court were in favour of the defendants' construction of the section; all the members of the latter in favour of that contended for on behalf of the Crown. The judges of the Queen's Bench were of opinion that it could not be imagined that the propriety of giving such a power escaped the consideration of the Legislature when the special provisions of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act were framed; that there might be, and probably were, considerations which might render such a power inexpedient in revenue suits; and that they could not understand the policy of intrusting to the Lord Chief Baron and two or more barons of the Exchequer power to determine whether or not the Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber, and the House of Lords, should have jurisdiction to entertain an appeal against a judgment of the Exchequer in granting, or refusing, or discharging a rule for a new trial. The judges of the Common Pleas were of opinion, that the objection urged by the defendants, that it could not have been intended to give legislative authority to the Court of Exchequer was not well founded, inasmuch as there were numerous instances of similar delegations; for instance, the cases in which towns and other local communities were allowed to determine, by the voice of a majority, whether certain acts of Parliament for local government should or should not be put in force within the limits in which the inhabitants reside; that the venue "practice of the court" included "error;" that one member of the practice of the Court was the proceeding by which the judgment of the Court might be stayed, and the execution of the Court put off until it was determined whether the judgment pronounced by the Court was right or not; and that the understanding to be gathered from words with respect to practice was, that a proceeding by way of error or appeal is part of the practice on the side of the court in which the process originates.

Thus, the majority of the judges forming the Court of Error held that that Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and that the Court of Exchequer had been mistaken in its construction of the 26th section. It appears to have been taken for granted at once, and without discussion, by the Exchequer, that they had the power. The case was then taken up by the Crown to the House of Lords; the same arguments on either side were urged before that tribunal, and eventually four of the law Lords (Lords Westbury, St. Leonards, Kingsdown, and Chelmsford) agreed in opinion with the four judges of the Queen's Bench; Lords Wensleydale and Cranworth with the three judges of the Common Pleas; so that the decision of the Exchequer Chamber was affirmed, and consequently the judgment against the Crown held to be final. With reference to one of the arguments of the counsel for the defendants, viz. that at all events the barons had no power to make rules applicable to a pending proceeding, Lord Westbury observes—

"This argument is not, in my opinion, well founded. Many of the enactments contained in the Queen's Remembrancer's Act are so worded as to be applicable at once to pending proceedings. If, therefore, these rules are warranted by that statute, there can be no longer injustice in making them apply to pending proceedings, so long as they apply equally and impartially to both sides. Still, it is a subject of deep regret that any rules should have been made expressly with a view to the determination of a particular case. Four years had elapsed since the passing of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act, and the necessity of these rules had never occurred to the barons of the Court of Exchequer. On the eve of the argument of the motion for a new trial in this important case, the rules in question were made, without the time necessary for due deliberation. The result is, that the efforts made to settle a question of the gravest importance, and most essential for the guidance of the Government of the country, and regarded with great expectation, have been rendered abortive, or rather, to speak more correctly, the mons parturiens of this great cause, raised with so much labour and expense, will produce nothing but the ridiculous issue of some discordant opinions on the meaning of the word 'practice.'"

Lord Chelmsford also, in his judgment, expresses regret, that the rules should have been made by the barons without more consideration as to their power of making them, and also that they should have been made to affect a pending case. And there the matter ends for the present—ten judicial opinions against the views propounded by the counsel for the Crown, seven in their favour. We observe it stated in the public prints, that the Government has given up The Alexandra to its owners, who, we presume, will make a claim for the loss and expense they have sustained by her long detention.

In conclusion, we would call attention to a treatise^o on the Foreign Enlistment Act, written by Mr. Gibbs. This little publication enters upon the policy and the interpretation of the statute, and was written previously to the discussion in the case of The Alexandra, and, as the author tells us in the Preface, in the hope of supplying materials for that discussion, and of contributing towards the formation of a just and dispassionate public opinion upon a question of difficulty. Any one who reads his pamphlet must thoroughly understand the question, and can form his own opinion upon the statute.

THE Report of the Charity Commissioners, which we print at full length this week, shews how well the recent acts, giving increased jurisdiction to the Charity Commissioners, have worked.

Applications to the Court of Chancery have very much diminished; in fact, we presume that they are only necessary in cases of a contentious character, as where difficult questions of construction arise, or where the assistance of the Court is required to stay, by injunction, proceedings injurious to the property of charities.

The jurisdiction given by earlier acts to county courts seems almost to have fallen into disuse, for while in the year 1859 there were 146 authorised applications to the county courts, there were only seven in the year 1861, one in the year 1862, and one in the year 1863.

The Charitable Trusts Acts, however, still require some amendment. The commissioners, in their Report, allude to one of a very important character, which would in many cases be highly beneficial. At present, the board cannot exercise their jurisdiction, except upon the invitation of certain prescribed parties; but as these parties may have interests opposed to those of the charity, it is obvious that this restriction should be abolished.

Again: it seems that the commissioners have great difficulty in obtaining a regular delivery of the accounts of the receipts and expenditure of charities; and, as it is highly desirable that these accounts should be regularly sent in, Parliament might usefully confer upon the commissioners summary means of enforcing their delivery, by attaching penalties to their omission.

The acts, we think, require also an amendment, which the commissioners do not, in their Report, suggest.

By the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (except where the Attorney-General proceeds ex officio), before any suit can be instituted by any person as to a charity, notice of the proposed suit, explaining its objects, must be transmitted to the board, and their order or certificate must be obtained, authorising or directing such suit or other proceedings to be commenced. (Sect. 17).

Now, although this section is in some respects very useful, as preventing much litigation, which might be commenced at the expense of, and without any benefit to, the funds of charities, there are, nevertheless, some exceptional cases, in which the necessity of obtaining the certificate or order of the board to institute proceedings amounts to a denial of justice.

Take, for instance, the case where it is essential in order to protect the property of a charity, that an injunction should be at once obtained against a person about to do an act of irreparable damage to it. Before access can be obtained to the commissioners, and their certificate or order procured, the damage may have been done, and the expense incurred in laying the matter before the commissioners entirely thrown away.

This is not an imaginary case, but one which has happened, and doubtless may happen again.

There seems to be no reason why, in cases which do not admit of delay, such as those in which injunctions are sought on behalf of charities, suits should not, under some sufficient safeguard, be commenced without the authority of the commissioners.

STAMP DUTIES ON SETTLEMENTS.

WITH little or no observation on the part of the legal profession, and hitherto without any but a few casual remarks in the House of Commons, a bill is being hurried through Parliament, having for its object, among others, to impose an ad valorem duty on settlements of definite and certain sums of foreign or colonial currency, or shares of stocks or funds of foreign or colonial governments, states, corporations, or companies; and on settlements of any principal sums secured or contracted for by, or which may become due and payable upon, any bond, debenture, policy of insurance, covenant, or contract, which shall be settled or agreed to be settled, or on settlements of such bonds, debentures, policies, covenants or contracts, or assignments or transfers, by way of settlement, of such instruments, or agreements for such settlements; with a proviso, that the duty shall not be payable where the subject of any settlement shall be a policy of insurance, and there shall not be any certain covenant, contract, or provision, made for keeping up such policy. The bill referred to is the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, as amended in committee; the clauses referred to are the 11th and 12th, and the object of the present article is to draw attention to them, to point out the existing settlement duties, to explain what effect the bill will have upon them if it should be allowed to pass into law, and to suggest for consideration a scheme for their revision.

With reference, then, to the existing duties on settlements, it should be premised that they are the exception to the rule, and not the rule itself. Strictly speaking, there are not any settlement duties, properly so called, nor does the present bill propose to impose any. There are conveyance, mortgage, bond, and covenant duties, but no settlement duty; and the most important settlements, namely, those of extensive landed estates settled in strict settlement so as to devolve with a dukedom, are chargeable with duty as deeds not otherwise charged.

Duty is payable upon any deed or instrument whereby any definite and certain principal sums of money, whether charged on land or not, or to be laid out in land or not, or any definite and certain share in the public funds, Bank of England or Bank of Ireland stock, East India stock, or stock or funds of any other company or corporation, is either settled, or agreed so to be, either in possession or reversion, either absolutely or for life, or in any other manner. The duty is 5s. per 100l. If the deed contains a settlement of any other property, or contains any other matter besides the settlement of the money or stock, it is chargeable with the additional stamp duty which a separate deed containing such matter would be liable to; and if there should be two or more instruments for effecting a settlement, chargeable with duty exceeding 35s., one of them only is to be charged with the ad valorem duty, and the other with a deed stamp; and where the ad valorem duty shall have been paid upon articles, the settlement is not to be charged over again. The exemptions from the duty are, bonds, mortgages, and other securities operating as settlements, if chargeable with the ad valorem duties on bonds and mortgages.

The duty is upon definite and certain sums of money and stock. All other settlements are exempt from the duty on settlements. A settlement of a family estate, containing rent-charges, terms for raising large sums of money, portions for younger children, and extensive powers authorizing the conversion of the estate into money, will not require any other stamp than a common deed stamp of 35s.; but if it should embrace a sum of stock which shall have arisen under the powers of sale and exchange in a former settlement, and is impressed with the character of land; or a sum of money or stock representing land taken by a railway or other company (and which such company can be called upon to replace in land), such money or stock will be liable to ad valorem duty if put into a new settlement, although the interest is reversionary, and subject to a life interest, a widow's jointure, younger brother's and sister's portions, and other charges which render it impossible to withdraw the fund from settlement; so that a very small fragment of an estate, and yet an integral portion of it, may be liable to a greater amount of duty than the estate itself. Thus, an estate worth a million of money may be settled for a 35s. stamp, whilst 1000l. in the trustees' hands arising from it will require an additional duty of 2l. 10s.

So, if a determinable, renewable, or defeasible estate or interest be settled, and a policy of insurance effected and settled, in order, as near as can be, to replace, either entirely or partially, the value of the estate when it shall determine, or to provide a fund for its renewal, or otherwise to guard against a contingency, the duty will be but 35s. In short, if the settlement be of any other property than a definite and certain sum of money or stock, settlement duty will not be payable; but where the settled property is a definite and certain sum, within the meaning of the act, i. e. is unconditional and indefeasible, a uniform duty is chargeable, whether the sum settled be in possession or reversion, or be the whole interest, or a life, or partial interest.

What, then, is a definite and certain sum? A Bank of England note answers to that description, but so, in the eye of the law, does a country note of an insolvent bank; a sum of 5000l. charged on land worth 10,000l., or equally with one charged on land worth 10,000l., or imperfectly charged, or not charged at all, or secured by personal security of a solvent or insolvent debtor; a sum payable at the death of A. without interest, or payable at the same with interest in the meantime, or payable immediately; a sum of Consols immediately transferred to the trustees of the settlement; and a sum transferable at the death of A.

In a very recent case a sum was inadvertently included in a settlement; the right to it was disputed in a Chancery suit; the claim had been abandoned, and if that claim had been substantiated, there was no available fund, or ever would be, for its payment, yet the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, with knowledge of all the circumstances, adjudged an ad valorem stamp upon it as a definite and certain sum. The value of the sum of money, or of the security for it, is not taken into account; and a settlement of a sum of money may be liable to the duty though totally valueless.

If, however, the sum be of stock, then the rule is reserved, and the duty is assessed on the value of it at the market price of the day. It would be a great improvement if some means could be devised, by which the value of sums of money could be ascertained for the purpose of duty.

And whether the provision made by the settlement is only for a child during his minority, or for a son during the joint lives of himself and his father, or for a widow during her life or widowhood, or is for a husband and wife and the children of the marriage, or for any number of wives and their children in succession, precisely the same duty will be payable upon the settlement.

The exemptions from duty of definite and certain sums depend upon whether the instruments, or one of the instruments of settlement, is chargeable with the ad valorem duties on bonds and mortgages. The exemption clause is contained in the act, 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, and is incorporated with the existing act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97.

In the original act duties on bonds and mortgages were higher than those on settlements, now they are less by one half. Mortgages, but not bonds, require a further deed stamp in respect of the "other matter" which a settlement necessarily draws along with it, whether the settlement is contained in the instrument of mortgage or in a separate document. It seems difficult to find a satisfactory reason why a sum of money which is settled and directed to be forthwith invested on mortgage, should bear ad valorem duties of 5s. on a settlement, and 2s. 6d. on a mortgage, whilst the same sum, if invested on mortgage, with a view to the settlement, should only pay 2s. 6d. and a deed stamp. That there should be a distinction in the cases of bonds and covenants is intelligible, for these are but personal securities, and are rarely the subjects of settlement, except when given by the immediate parties to it, or by their near relations, and then, for the most part, because they have nothing else; in which cases a bond or covenant is taken for what it may turn out to be worth; but though the distinction is intelligible, it could not have been the reason, because, as will be seen, covenants were, and still are, liable to settlement duty, whilst bonds are not, nor ever have been.

Whether a transfer of a mortgage or bond is liable to the duty is not clear. A transfer of either of these instruments is chargeable under the head bond or mortgage, with ad valorem duty, up to 1400*l.*, and beyond that sum with a duty of 35*s.*; and if any further sum be added to the sum secured, then with an ad valorem duty on the further sum. So that a transfer of a bond or mortgage for 1400*l.* would require an ad valorem duty of 35*s.*; a transfer for 1500*l.* and upwards, 35*s.*; and a transfer for 10,000*l.* with 50*l.* added, a single duty of 1*s.* 3*d.* The duty is, therefore, a limited ad valorem duty up to 1400*l.*, of the same amount as an original bond or mortgage; and probably it would be held that transfers up to that amount, or to any amount with further sums added, would be exempt from settlement duty, whilst transfers bearing a 35*s.* stamp would be liable.

Covenants are an anomaly; they were not originally exempted from settlement duty, and consequently were liable to it. The duty on them was imposed by the existing act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, and the rate, where the sum secured exceeds 1400*l.*, is the same as on bonds and mortgages; but a covenant in a settlement is exempt from covenant duty, where chargeable with settlement duty; and where the sum is under 1400*l.*, there is no covenant duty; but if it is above, there is an exemption out of an exemption, which leaves the matter as it originally stood; and thus covenants are still liable to settlement duty.

Settlements containing a covenant for payment of an annuity or rent-charge, and bonds operating as settlements of any annuity, are chargeable with covenant and bond duty at 2*l.* per cent.; and the rate is uniform, whether the annuity be for life or any other indefinite period. A settlement, therefore, containing a covenant to pay a sum of money at the death of A., and to pay an annuity in the meantime as a present provision, is chargeable with settlement duty on the sum, and a covenant duty on the annuity; but the latter duty might be avoided by making the present provision payable by way of interest. So, where a settlement is made of a reversionary interest in money or stock, and a present provision is secured by way of annuity, or of a rent-charge issuing out of land, with powers of distress and entry; but in that case a covenant ought not to be inserted.

The result of the review of the existing duties is—first, that definite and certain sums only are liable to duty; secondly, that the duty will be payable on the sum, if definite and certain, though it be valueless; thirdly, that sums secured by covenant are liable, and sums secured by bonds and mortgages are not; fourthly, that it is doubtful whether transfers of bonds or mortgages are liable; fifthly, that annuities secured by covenants in settlements are liable to covenant duties, and not settlement duty; and, lastly, that the rate or amount of duty is not governed by the nature and object or duration of the settlement.

The next subject for consideration is the effect which the bill will have upon the existing duties. So far as it proposes to bring within the area of taxation foreign and colonial currency and stocks, it is not unreasonable. There is no valid reason why settlements should escape duty solely in consequence of the subjects of them being property of that description. At the same time, it must strike every reader, that settlers would scarcely hit upon the expedient of investing in foreign or colonial securities for the mere purpose of avoiding settlement duty. Possibly, in a few cases, the duty on some small sums may have been lost to the Government by such investments, and alarm may have been created at Somerset House lest all Englishmen should place the provisions which they make for their wives and families in Spanish or Pennsylvanian bonds or the Greek loan; but there is no real cause for fear. Somerset House might well rest assured, that foreign securities would not be largely patronised, nor colonial ones very eagerly sought after. Still, the 11th clause, imposing the duty, is harmless, and perhaps may be necessary; not so, however, the 12th, which is of a mischievous tendency.

In the first place, the principle of a definite and certain sum is departed from, and any principal sum, secured by bond, debentures, covenant, or contract, as well as by a policy of insurance, is to be chargeable. A sum payable upon a contingency, and a policy pointed against the contingency, will be liable to two duties, although but one sum can become payable. Bonds will no longer be exempt from settlement duty, nor transfers of bonds, all questions as to the latter being determined in favour of the duty. Debentures are mortgages, but are to be charged, though mortgages are to remain exempt. Covenants already charged with duty on definite and certain sums, will be liable to duty on contingent sums. "Contracts" is so general a word, that it is difficult to foretell what it may cover. The general scope of the clause is to place sums secured by mere personal security upon the same footing as realised property; and in the case of contingent sums, to make them liable when, if charged upon land or other realised property, they would not be.

If it is said that the words "any principal sum" mean any definite and certain principal sum, the context shews the contrary. They must necessarily receive the same construction in the same sentence; and a sum secured by a policy is not, in any imaginable case, definite and certain; in the most ordinary one, it is contingent on the annual payment being made; and it scarcely needed the decision in Sanville v. The Inland Commissioners (10 Exch. 159), that a sum would be none the less contingent because collaterally secured by a personal covenant.

The object of the clause is, we are told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to remove "a most arbitrary distinction," that distinction being, that there is no difference between a sum of money insured by a policy and a sum of money covenanted to be paid. It is really a waste of words to attempt to answer a fallacy so transparent. There is every possible difference. But granted that such was the object of the clause, what is the meaning of it? Do the words "a principal sum which may become payable upon a policy of insurance" include a fire policy, if introduced into a settlement, or a policy on a ship, or an insurance against issue, or an indemnity policy, or, in short, a policy of insurance against any event, or for the protection, guarantee, or indemnity of any one of the numerous and multifarious matters which are introduced into settlements of determinable, defeasible, or renewable estates or interests? It would seem so. Or would a policy of insurance make any such estate or interest definite or certain which would otherwise be contingent? Or would a covenant to keep on foot a policy pointed at the contingency make it definite or certain? If not, how can it be said that a sum secured by a policy such a covenant is definite and certain? The object, no doubt, is to reach a life policy, effected simpliciter as a provision; and it is found that one man's policy cannot be taxed without another's, and that there is no distinction between one sort of policy and another. True, one policy cannot be taxed without another; but the question is, whether it is expedient to tax any; and as the interests represented by policies are infinitely variable, whilst the only recognised subjects for taxation at present are definite and certain sums of money and stock, which policies certainly are not, it does become a very grave question whether they are proper subjects for taxation. Certainly they are not under the pretext of correcting an anomaly. As between an owner in fee-simple of land and an owner of a base fee determinable with the failure of his issue, or the owner of any qualified, conditional, determinable, or defeasible estate in fee, for lives or years, who effects a policy upon any lives, or against any event, either to replace or to provide funds for renewal of his estate or interest, how is any arbitrary distinction removed by taxing the policy which is to render his property as permanent as the circumstances will permit? And if, upon just principles, his policy cannot be taxed, upon what principle can a policy effected by one who has no estate or interest to support it except his business or profession, which will die with him, be taxed? The fact is, a policy is unlike any other description of property—can scarcely ever be called property at all, unless taken at its money value. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Attorney-General say it is precisely the same thing as a sum payable by instalments; but it is not so, because every instalment paid immediately forms capital, which is not the case with insurance, for all may be lost if the policy is not kept up. Again: covenants to keep on foot a policy are not equivalent to a provision for that purpose; and where there is a provision, income of property which has paid the duty, or which is not liable to it, must be diverted from the settlement in order to create the sum insured.

If, however, it is considered expedient that policies should be taxed on their nominal value, the fairest way would seem to be, to make the duty payable when they become claims, and to impose upon insurance offices having notice of settlements (as they always have) the obligation of seeing that it is paid, upon peril of not getting a legal discharge, in the same way as trustees and executors are bound in the cases of legacy and succession duty.

Scheme for Settlement Duties.

Settlements of estates to be chargeable with 5s. per 100*l.* duty on the sum raisable for portions of younger children, and if no portions are raisable, then upon a principal sum which would yield, at 4*l.* per cent., the amount of the wife's jointure, or, if not a marriage settlement, the amount authorised to be raised for portions or jointure.

Settlements of land which do not contain provisions for portions or jointure, and of all other estates or interests in land or other property, except definite and certain sums of money and stock, 1*l.* 15s.

Settlements of definite and certain sums of money and stock, including money or stock to be laid out in land (other than money or stock which has arisen from the sale of land under a former settlement, or which is otherwise applicable under a former settlement to be laid out in land), including foreign and colonial currency and stock:—

Where sums charged on land, or secured otherwise than by personal security, 5s. per 100*l.*

Where sums secured by bond, covenant, or other personal security, only 2s. 6d. per 100*l.*

Where reversionary interest in any sums of money or stock expectant upon the determination of a life or lives, without any provision in the meantime, 5s. per 100*l.*, less a deduction of 1s. per 100*l.* duty on an annuity, equivalent to interest at 4*l.* per cent. on sum, or the annual dividends on the stock.

The same, with provision in the meantime (and any annuity secured by the settlement, or one of the settlements, to be deemed a provision, though more or less than equivalent to interest), 5s. per 100*l.*

Where it appears on the face of the settlement, or can be proved to the commissioners, that a definite and certain sum is not worth its nominal value, the duty to be taken at the actual value, and denoting stamp to be affixed.

Duty on stock to be calculated, as at present.

Settlement of any annuity secured by covenant only, or of any annuity or rent-charge howsoever secured (other than an annuity in a settlement of a reversionary interest in any definite and certain sum, &c., or a rent-charge, or other annual sum, by way of present provision for any person taking a life estate or interest in remainder, or reversion, or jointure under the settlement):—

Where the annuity or rent-charge shall be for life or lives, not exceeding three, or for a term or terms of years, determinable with a life or lives, not exceeding three, 1*l.* per 100*l.*

Where the annuity or rent-charge shall be in fee, or for any definite period, 2*l.* per 100*l.*

Exempt bonds, covenants, and mortgages where charged with settlement duties.

Exempt mortgages from mortgage and transfer duties, and make them liable to settlement duty.

Exempt covenants from all duty where not the principal or primary security.

Exempt policies from all duty.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS FOR ENGLAND AND WALES.

THE Charity Commissioners for England and Wales have made their Eleventh Report; it is as follows:—

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

May it please your Majesty,

We, the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, humbly submit to your Majesty the following Report of our proceedings during the year 1863.

There has been a continued increase in the number of special applications for the assistance or intervention of our board with reference to particular charities, 1303 such applications having been received during the past year. The numbers received in the three preceding years respectively were 1094, 1179, and 1234.

We subjoin, as in former years, a statement of the number and principal objects of the formal orders which we have had occasion to make during the year, in cases not concluded by correspondence only, or in the presence of the parties. The numbers of like orders made during the preceding year are added for the purpose of comparison:—

Objects of Orders.	Number.
	During the year 1863.	During the year 1862.
Authorising applications to the Court of Chancery	30	18
— the county courts	1	1
— the courts of common law	6	2
Appointing and removing trustees, and establishing schemes, or for some of those purposes	351	280
Certifying cases to the Attorney-General, with a view to the institution by him of ex officio proceedings	2	8
Conveying advice to trustees for their protection and indemnity in the discharge of their official duties	57	59
Authorising sales of charity estates	151	137
— exchanges of such estates*	6	9
— building, mining, or other special leases of charity estates	165	87
— improvements of such estates, and the raising or appropriation of the necessary funds	41	35
— the compromise of disputed claims	27	6
— transfers of funds to the "Official Trustees of Charitable Funds"	610	616
For various purposes not comprised under any of the foregoing heads	165	182
	1612	1410

A large number of cases is still subject to the inquiries and consideration which must necessarily precede their final determination.

The further experience which has been acquired of the operation of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1860, which for the first time extended to our board certain important powers over endowed charities previously exercisable only by the judicial courts, particularly for the discharge and appointment of trustees, and the establishment of schemes for their government, fully confirms the anticipations of the beneficial effect of that measure. The following statement of the comparative numbers of applications authorised to be made to the Court of Chancery and the county courts for the stated objects in the year 1859, which immediately preceded the passing of that act, and in the three last years, during which it has been in force, and of the number of definitive orders made under it by our board during the latter period, will shew how large a measure of beneficial relief is already afforded by it to charitable institutions, and to how great an extent the functions of the judicial courts for the administration of such relief have been practically transferred to this board:—

* The powers of the Inclosure Commissioners to make exchanges of charity lands being more summary and beneficial than the powers vested in our board for the same purpose, such transactions are most generally referred to their cognisance.

	In the year 1859.	In the year 1861.	In the year 1862.	In the year 1863.
Number of authorised applications to the Court of Chancery — county courts	86 146	18 7	32 1	30 1
Number of orders made by the board under the direct jurisdiction created by the act 1860, for the appointment or removal of trustees, and establishment of schemes, or for some of those purposes	—	207	280	351

If so simple and inexpensive a jurisdiction has been also safely and judiciously exercised, this past experience and the future prospect of its operation must be considered very satisfactory. We venture to state only, that the publicity which must precede all our orders appears to us to be very effectual for the anticipation and exclusion of objections to which they might otherwise be subject, and that although the law has provided a great facility of appeal from such orders, and those definitely made by us before the close of the past year have amounted to no less than 138 in number, yet no instance has occurred of the exercise of that right of appeal.

The restraint of this jurisdiction arising from the provisions of the law which prohibits its exercise, except upon the invitation only of prescribed parties (whose interests may sometimes be even opposed to those of the charities) has been referred to in our previous Reports. The inconvenience of this restriction is proportionate to the salutary character of the jurisdiction which is excluded.

The entire amount of various stocks transferred to the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds during the year 1863, has been 269,488*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*; the amount re-transferred by them during the same period principally for effecting re-investments in land, has been 14,670*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* The total amount standing in the name of the official trustees at the end of the year was 1,634,045*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.* on 3116 separate accounts, to which the dividends are credited, and are then regularly remitted to the proper recipients.

The following statement, in continuation of those made by our former Reports, will shew the amounts of various stocks transferred to the official trustees, and re-transferred by them in each year since 1854 inclusively:—

	Amount of stock transferred.	Amount re-transferred.
In the year 1854	£8,660 16 11	—
“ 1855	21,158 17 3	—

Total amount of stocks standing in name of “The Official Trustees of Charitable Funds,” 31st December, 1863	£1,634,045 17 8

Note.—The sums re-transferred represent principally the proceeds of the sale of real estate re-invested in the purchase of other real estate under orders of our board.

We have inserted in an Appendix the particulars of the stocks transferred to the official trustees during the past year, distinguishing the amounts belonging to each of the charities interested therein.

Our inspectors have been actively engaged under our direction in investigating the circumstances of various charitable foundations, particularly of several of the more important charities in and near the metropolis.

The only scheme which we have thought it desirable to prepare during the past year, with a view to its being submitted to the consideration of Parliament, is for the Grammar School at Coventry.

This scheme, promoted by the trustees of the school, with the approval of the bishop of the diocese and the principal inhabitants of Coventry, has for its object the permanent separation of the offices of rector of the parish of St. John Coventry and master of the grammar school, which were united by an act of Parliament passed in the year 1734. The objections to the continued union of these two offices, very imperfectly compatible in the same person, are apparent. The scheme for their severance, provisionally approved and certified by our board in conformity with the provisions of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, is set forth in the Appendix to this Report, together with an explanatory statement of the circumstances.

During the past year the particulars of 473 charitable foundations, either newly created or not previously noticed in any public record, have been ascertained, and are in a course of registration in our office.

The number of returns which we have received during the year of the accounts of the receipts and expenditure of charities has been 14,822.

We have had occasion to notice in our former Reports the difficulty of obtaining the regular delivery of these accounts, in the absence of any summary means of enforcing them, and of any penalties attached to their omission.

Considerable progress has been made in the compilation of the general digest of endowment charities, referred to in our former Reports.

It already comprises, so far as it has been practicable to extend it by laborious inquiry, all the local or parochial endowments of a considerable number of counties, with the objects to which their incomes are distributively applicable; and the collection of the same particulars in the remaining counties, and of the general charities of which the application is not confined to particular parishes or limited districts, is also in regular progress. Although such records can be made only approximately complete, and some particulars as of the endowments of various religious denominations separated from the Established Church, can be very imperfectly stated, we still hope that this digest will be found of much practical utility as well as interest. It contains all the information obtainable for its purposes from the Reports of the former Commissioners of Inquiry; from the returns of account made to our office; from all special applications and communications made to our board; from the Reports of our inspectors and from the local knowledge of incumbents of parishes, to whom extracts of it have been most generally submitted for any necessary extension or correction; and from accidental sources.

We insert in the Appendix a summary of the digest of the parochial or local charities of ten counties, and of the cities of London and Westminster, shewing their gross incomes, and the objects to which they are applicable.

The total gross yearly income of the charities which it comprises amounts to 430,720*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, which exceeds the income assigned by the Reports of the former Commissioners of Inquiry to the same class of endowments, in the same localities, by somewhat more than 150,000*l.*, the former amount having been 280,693*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*

It is proper to make some observation on the constitution of this large excess.

An income of upwards of 31,000*l.* which enters into it is derived from charities not included in the Reports of the former commissioners, although of prior foundation.

A considerable addition to the former income of many charities comprised in those Reports has resulted from legal proceedings instituted since their date for the restitution of charitable rights which had been in suspense, and a yearly income of 22,420*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.* is derived from new charities founded since the former Reports in the proportions of 11,780*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.*, arising from foundations made by will, and 10,639*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* from charities founded by deed or other acts, inter vivos.

The remainder of the increase is due in a very principal degree to the improved productiveness of the endowments, the value of which, especially in the metropolis and its vicinity, has been very largely augmented, resulting in some instances, especially of charities applicable within the city of London, in a disproportion of the endowments to the purposes or objects of the foundations, which may well deserve at no distant period the interposition of the Legislature to regulate their application.

All which we humbly report to your Majesty.

In witness whereof, we have directed our official seal to be hereto affixed, this 27th day of February, 1864.

(L. S.)

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, April 28.

The royal assent was given by commission to (amongst others) the Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes (Ireland) Bill, and the Conveyances (Ireland) Bill.

The Marquis of Westmeath moved the third reading of the Punishment of Rape Bill.

Lord Wodehouse said, on a former occasion he had given notice of an amendment which he intended moving on the third reading. The object of his amendment was to render it discretionary, and not compulsory, upon judges to order the infliction of the punishment of flogging in the case of a conviction for rape. That object would be obtained by substituting the word "may" for "shall" in the bill; and this amendment he now moved.

Lord Wensleydale opposed the amendment.

The Lord Chancellor thought, that if this punishment were made compulsory, there would be a greater disinclination on the part of juries to convict than there was at present. He had consulted the learned judges on the subject, and they were decidedly of opinion, that the infliction of this part of the punishment should be left discretionary with the judge to order. He had received a letter from the Lord Chief Justice, in which he stated, that he was persuaded the reluctance on the part of the juries to convict did not arise from any want of abhorrence of the crime itself, but from the frequency of cases in which charges of this nature were preferred, either wholly without foundation, or where the woman had turned round upon the man to whom she had given encouragement.

The Marquis of Westmeath said, after what he had heard, he should be unwilling to do anything that would be likely to endanger the result of trials of this character. He would, therefore, assent to the amendment.

Earl Grey said it appeared to him, that the arguments relied upon by the learned judges in favour of this discretionary power went directly to a contrary conclusion. It appeared, that the indisposition of juries to convict did not arise from any want of horror of the crime, but from the belief that the charge was frequently made without foundation.

The House then divided upon the amendment, and there were—

The amendment was accordingly agreed to; and on the question that the bill do pass,

The Marquis of Westmeath entered his earnest protest against Parliament having taken away the power of capital punishment in cases of this kind, when more than one person was concerned.

The bill was then passed.

The Regius Professorship of Greek (Oxford) Bill, after some debate, was read a second time.

The Joint-stock Companies (Foreign Countries) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Registration of County Voters (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

Monday, May 2.

The High Court of Bombay Bill passed through committee.

Tuesday, May 3.

The High Court of Bombay Bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, April 28.

On the motion for going into committee of supply, Mr. Peacocke moved, "That the instructions contained in the despatch of the Duke of Newcastle to Sir R. P. Wodehouse, dated the 4th November, 1863 (relative to the Tuscaloosa), and which remain still unrevoked, are at variance with the principles of international law." After a long debate, the resolution was negatived by 219 to 185.

Friday, April 29.

Mr. P. Wyndham rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it was the intention of the Government to bring in a bill this session to amend the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1861. Sufficient funds to carry out the provision of the act could not be raised by the voluntary principle. Those who fished for profit or pleasure ought to be compelled to contribute towards preserving the waters.

Mr. F. G. Baring said the matter was under the consideration of the Government, who hoped to be able to bring in a bill upon the subject this session, though they would not pledge themselves so to do.

Mr. H. Berkeley moved—"That this House will upon Monday next resolve itself into a committee to consider of an address to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct adequate compensation to be made to William Bewicke, of Threepwood Hall, in the county of Northumberland, for the pain, degradation, anguish of mind, and consequent ill-health, he has suffered in being confined for twelve months in a prison as a felon on a charge since proved to be false; for the confiscation of his goods, chattels, family pictures, plate, and library, thus inflicting upon him an irreparable injury; also for the heavy pecuniary loss he has suffered in prosecuting and bringing to justice the persons who had conspired against him, such having been the only means by which eventually he was enabled to establish his innocence; and that this House is prepared to assure her Majesty that it will make good the same."

After a debate of some length, an amendment was carried, to leave out the words after the word "that," in order to insert these words:—"A select committee be appointed to consider the petition of Mr. William Bewicke, of Threepwood Hall, in the county of Northumberland, on the 28th April, 1863, and to report its opinion to this House as to whether Mr. Bewicke is entitled to any and what compensation."

Mr. Digby Seymour then called attention to the extensive employment of climbing boys in sweeping chimneys, and the systematic violation of the "Act for the Regulation of Chimney Sweepers and Chimneys" (3 & 4 Vict. c. 85), and asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce any bill during the present session founded on the recommendations of the Children's Employment Commission, 1862.

Sir G. Grey believed that, as stated by the hon. gentleman, there was an extensive evasion of the law. The attention of Government had been directed to the subject, and the Earl of Shaftesbury, at whose suggestion the royal commission had been appointed, was, in conjunction with the Government, about to introduce a bill on the subject in the other House.

The Report on the Penal Servitude Amendment Bill being brought up to be considered, Mr. Whitbread proposed a clause, which, after some debate, was withdrawn.

Mr. Hunt moved the alteration of the fourth clause, to the effect, that if the holder of a license, unless prevented by illness or other unavoidable cause, did not report himself personally to the chief police station of the borough or police division to which he may go within three days after his arrival therein, and subsequently once in each month at the time, place, and manner, and to the person the chief officer shall appoint, or shall change his residence without having previously notified the same to the police station to which he last reported himself, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and may be summarily convicted thereof, and his license shall be forthwith forfeited by virtue of such conviction, but he shall not be liable to any other punishment by virtue of such conviction.

The clause as amended was agreed to.

Some further verbal amendments having been agreed to, the Report was adopted.

The Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill, as amended, was considered, and an amendment, proposed by Mr. O'Hagan, was agreed to.

The Attorney-General obtained leave to introduce a bill to indemnify certain persons from any penalties which they might have incurred by sitting as members of the House of Commons while holding the office of Under-Secretaries of State.

The Attorney-General moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the process, practice, and mode of pleading in the superior courts of common law at Dublin.

Mr. Whiteside said, that unless coerced to that course, he should never consent to the introduction of this bill.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Monday, May 2.

Mr. Baxter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, after the expression of opinion in the debate on the Bank Notes (Scotland) Bill, he meant to proceed with the Bank Acts Bill for Scotland.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that during the recent discussion a general opinion had been expressed on the part of the representatives of Scotland that it would be better not to deal partially with any isolated point belonging to the currency or banking; and as no great public interest was involved in going forward with a bill of so limited a scope, he would defer to that feeling, and not ask the House to proceed further with the bill.

Mr. Carnegie asked the Lord Advocate whether it was the intention of the Government to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the nature and working of the law of hypothec as regarded agricultural subjects in Scotland.

The Lord Advocate replied in the affirmative.

Mr. Carnegie said, in that case he would not proceed with the motion of which he had given notice.

The amendments to the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill were considered, and some verbal amendments introduced.

Mr. Malins proposed an amendment in the clause—to strike out that part of it which is intended to impose an ad valorem duty on settlements of policies of insurance. The Court of Exchequer had decided, that such settlements were not liable to the duty. If a man, on his marriage, effected a settlement of a policy for 5000*l.* upon his wife, it was proposed by the bill to charge that with duty, the same as if it was 5000*l.* Consols, although such policy on the day it was made was worth nothing. It was true that the bill provided, that the duty should only be charged where there was a covenant to keep up the premiums. But sometimes the covenant was, that the premiums should be paid out of the wife's money, so that in that case the money would be taxed twice over. He proposed to omit that part of the clause which would impose this new tax.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the object of the clause was to remove a most arbitrary distinction. If there was a covenant in the settlement to keep up the premiums, that covenant was equivalent to a bond. Why, then, should the bond be taxed, and not the policy, both being the subject of settlement? The judgment of the Court of Exchequer, to which the hon. and learned gentleman had alluded, was not a judgment which the Government could appeal against. If that course had been open to them, they would have obtained the judgment of a higher tribunal. The law officers of the Crown had given an opinion to the effect, that life policies were chargeable, and they had recommended the Government to continue to charge the duty. The practice, therefore, had been to charge the duty, leaving the parties to rely on the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, if they pleased. No one had done so, however, thereby indicating the general opinion as to the worthlessness of the judgment. The taxation upon settled property was exceedingly low as compared with unsettled property. It was only 5s. per cent., and it should be borne in mind, that the settlements of those policies escaped the probate duty, which amounted to 2l. 10s. per cent.

Mr. Hunt thought the amendment of the hon. and learned member for Wallingford (Mr. Maitnes) ought to be adopted. He was surprised that the law officers had given any such opinion as that stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It seemed to him to be unconstitutional.

The Attorney-General said, that if the husband made a settlement out of future profits of 5000l., to be payable at his decease, that settlement would pay the duty; but if the settlement were a policy, it would not. This was an anomaly that the bill proposed to remove.

After a short discussion, the House divided, and the numbers were—

For the clause	161
For the amendment	124

Majority for the clause 37

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved an amendment, that the stamp duty on powers of attorney given by seamen to receive their wages should be reduced to 1s.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Penal Servitude Acts Amendment Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

The Lord Advocate obtained leave to bring in a bill to prevent the discharge of impure water from manufactories into rivers in Scotland.

The Lord Advocate also obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the administration of trusts, and to regulate the powers of trustees in Scotland.

The Admiralty Lands and Works Bill was read a first time.

Tuesday, May 3.

Mr. A. Mills asked the First Commissioner of Works when the bill for the concentration of the courts of justices, which, on the 22nd April, he stated would be brought forward in a few days, would be introduced by the Government.

Mr. Copey said the introduction of his bill depended entirely upon the introduction of another bill for supplying funds, which must be brought forward by another member of the Government; and he was, therefore, unable to give any satisfactory answer.

Mr. Paull asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether his attention had been drawn to a bill, intitled "A Bill to amend the Constitution, Practice, and Procedure of the Courts of the Island of Jersey," purporting to deal with the judicial establishments and taxation of the said island, and asked whether such bill had been introduced with the concurrence and approval of her Majesty's Government.

Sir G. Grey said he had stated his views respecting the bill on the second reading. Since then he had suggested to the hon. member in charge of the bill, that it should be postponed until some correspondence with the Lieutenant-Governor had been published; and his hon. friend (Mr. Locke) had agreed to act upon that suggestion.

Mr. W. Ewart moved the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the expediency of maintaining the punishment of death.

Lord H. Lennox moved as an amendment, that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the laws relating to capital punishment.

Mr. Mitford seconded the amendment, because it opened a wider field for inquiry than the motion.

Mr. Neate, who had upon the paper notice of an amendment for a royal commission to inquire into the provisions and operation of the laws under which the punishment of death is now inflicted, said he did not think the terms of the motion, or of the amendment of the noble Lord, would give as comprehensive a scope to the inquiry as the circumstances warranted.

After some debate, the motion and Lord H. Lennox's amendment were severally withdrawn.

Mr. Neate then moved as a substantive resolution, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to issue a royal commission to inquire into the provisions and operation of the law under which the punishment of death is inflicted, and the manner in which it has been executed in the United Kingdom, and to report whether it is desirable to make any alteration therein.

After some observations from Mr. Denman and Sir G. Grey, the motion was agreed to.

Leave was given to Mr. Ferrand to bring in a bill for compensating families of persons killed by boiler explosions through the neglect or default of the owner. The bill was read a first time.

Mr. Paull moved the second reading of the Insolvent Debtors Bill, the object of which is to extend the benefit of the present law to debtors under 20l.

After some debate, the bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on the 8th June.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was read a third time, and passed.

On the order of the day for going into the Partnership-law Amendment Bill, Mr. T. Baring moved that the House do go into committee that day six months.

Mr. Hubbard and Mr. Buchanan having spoken against, and Mr. Goschen and Mr. Alderman Salomons in favour of, the principle of the bill, the amendment was withdrawn, and clauses 1 and 2 were agreed to.

Mr. T. Baring proposed an amendment to clause 3, and after some debate, the committee divided—

Wednesday, May 4.

The House went into committee on the Chief Rents (Ireland) Bill, and the clauses from 1 to 12 were agreed to, except clause 4, which, on the motion of Sir C. O'Loghlen, was omitted from the bill.

At the ANNUAL MEETING of the PROPRIETORS, held on THURSDAY, the 4th February, 1864, at the LONDON TAVERN, Bishopsgate-street, the following Report for the Year ending the 31st December, 1863, was read by the Secretary.

WILLIAM NICOL, ESQ., M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

REPORT.

The Directors, in submitting to the Proprietors the Accounts of the Bank for the Half-year ending the 31st December, 1863, have much satisfaction in reporting that the Net Profit for the Six Months, after deducting all charges, amounts to 84,325*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, which, added to 14,343*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* brought forward from the last Account, results in a total of 98,668*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*

Out of this Sum the Directors recommend that the usual Dividend of 61. per Cent., together with the Bonus of 61. per Cent., be declared for the Half-year, making, with the Dividend paid in August last, 181. per Cent. for the Year. They further propose to carry 10,000*l.* to the Reserve Fund, making that Fund 100,000*l.*, leaving 16,668*l.* 5*l.* 10*d.* to be carried forward to Profit and Loss new Account.

In consequence of the great increase of the Business of the Bank, the Directors consider it advisable further to increase the Capital of the Company, by the issue of 7500 New Shares, to be offered, pro rata, amongst the Proprietors, as they appeared in the Register on the 3rd instant, the day where the Transfer Books of the Company were closed; such Shares to be issued at the price of 10*l.* each, being a premium of 20*l.* per Share. Full particulars of the Issue will be transmitted by Circular to each Proprietor.

This operation will produce 300,000⁰⁰., out of which 150,000⁰⁰., will be added to the Capital of the Company, and 150,000⁰⁰., (being the Premium on the Shares), will be added to the Reserve Fund, raising the former to 750,000⁰⁰., and the latter to 250,000⁰⁰.,—together One Million.

The Directors regret having to announce the decease of HENRY OVERTON, Esq., for many years one of the Auditors of the Bank. This creates a vacancy in the Auditorship, which it is in the power of the Meeting to fill up.

The Directors retiring by rotation are—

PHILIP PATTON BLYTH, Esq.,

EDWARD HUGGINS, Esq.,

and WILLIAM LEE, Esq., M.P.,

all of whom are eligible for re-election, and offer themselves accordingly.

The Dividend will be payable at the Head Office, or at any of the Branches, on and after Monday, the 15th instant.

I have found him a first-rate clerk; he has kept my books, made out accounts and states, frequently taken charge of cash, and managed matters of general business. He is intelligent, well-behaved, strictly honest, attentive, obliging, and painstaking. He is a good accountant, and engrosses deeds very neatly and accurately. I have no doubt he will discharge any duties he undertakes to the satisfaction of his employer. I may add, that I have not found his unfortunate lameness to be any disqualification to him as a clerk. THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 14, 1864.

THE power which has been given to judges by some recent statutes to add the punishment of whipping to that of imprisonment or penal servitude, is a remarkable feature in legislation. The latest of these statutes is the Punishment of Rape Bill, introduced into the House of Lords by the Marquis of Westmeath, and which passed its third reading in that House on the 28th April. It provides, that any person convicted of the crime of rape may, in addition to any punishment awarded by any law now or hereafter in force, be twice or thrice privately whipped; that any person convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape may, in addition to the other punishment, be once privately whipped; and thirdly, "Where any person shall act, abet, or assist another to commit the crime of rape, such person shall be liable to the same punishment as the principal, or to any mitigated punishment as the Court may award."

The punishment in respect of the two first offences—rape, or assault with intent to commit rape—can only be applicable to males, but there is no reason why a female should not be guilty of the aiding and abetting others to commit rape; and taking this 3rd section by itself, the judge would have power to order a female to be whipped; but the 4th section provides, that the act shall be construed with, and subject to, the provisions of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 44; and sect. 1 of the latter act provides, that "the offender, if a male, may be whipped," &c. No doubt, therefore, this restriction of the punishment to males is contained by implication in the 4th section of the act just passed through the House of Lords, as well as the other provisions of the earlier statute limiting the number of strokes at each whipping to be twenty-five where the age does not exceed sixteen years, and directing that a birch rod be the instrument used.

Lord Westmeath's bill has yet to pass the House of Commons, but we do not suppose it will be thrown out there. It is not a pleasant reflection, that in these days, in which civilisation is so advanced, and so much is really and earnestly done to improve and reform the classes in which criminal offenders are contained, it should be considered necessary to take a retrograde step, and impose a punishment which many think only applicable to brutes. But if men will behave like brutes they must be treated as such; if they are not deterred by any manly feeling, or even by fear of the ordinary punishments, from committing rapes or other acts of the grossest violence, any punishment short of death, which is likely to deter them, must be inflicted. The act of last session (26 & 27 Vict. c. 44) was passed, because the punishments imposed by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, were found insufficient to check the numerous garrotte robberies which kept many of the inhabitants of the metropolis in a state of terror; and it appears to have effected its object. In fact, we believe that most men are afraid of physical pain, and that the punishment being carried out privately increases the dread of it.

It is very right that women should in every possible way be protected from the brutal violence to which they are so often exposed; and we are far from objecting to Lord Westmeath's bill; but we think there should be a difference in the punishment, regulated by the circumstances of the crime. Where, as in some recent instances, five or six men are parties to a rape, and the unhappy woman is half killed by their outrages upon her person, no amount of pain inflicted upon them by whipping can be too severe. If fifty lashes are not too much in an ordinary case of rape, double that number are not too much where the crime is of so aggravated a nature. Again: where the female is of tender age, and possesses less strength than a full-grown woman to resist violence, the whipping should be more severe. We make these observations upon the assumption that a criminal does not undergo any serious risk to life, or even any permanent bodily injury, by suffering a whipping of fifty lashes, the extreme number allowed by the statute. If he does, then, of course, that number would be reserved by the judge, as a punishment for the more atrocious kinds of rape, and a less number inflicted for lighter cases.

At present the punishment of whipping is, in the case of adult criminals, limited to cases where violence is done to the person, and is, we presume, so limited, upon the principle, that those who do violence to the persons of others shall, as part of their punishment, have violence done to their own persons; but it is not easy to see why the punishment should not be inflicted in the case of any serious crime, if it is likely to deter men from committing it: if criminals fear physical pain, the more generally this punishment is applicable, the more likely are they to be deterred from crime. Why should whipping be limited to persons under the age of sixteen years, in the several cases in which it may be awarded under the provisions of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100? It was thought advisable by the Legislature to extend it, by the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 44, to persons above that age; and Lord Westmeath's act, if passed, is to the same effect. The punishment is to be privately inflicted, so that no feeling of delicacy can interfere with its application to full-grown persons; and therefore it is difficult to say why it should not be inflicted in all cases of serious crime—the judge, of course, having a discretion as to its infliction, which he would regulate by the circumstances of the particular case, and the previous character of the offender.

The fact that the Legislature has thus considered it necessary to introduce the punishment of whipping, affords an argument against those who are so eager to abolish it in the case of soldiers and sailors. By the present Mutiny Acts, not more than fifty lashes can be awarded; nor even that, or any number of lashes, can be awarded by a regimental court-martial without the consent of the general commanding the district. The 22nd section of the Mutiny Act runs thus:—

"Any court-martial may sentence any soldier to corporal punishment, not extending to life or limbs, for desertion, or for disgraceful conduct, misbehaviour, or neglect of duty, but no sentence of corporal punishment, awarded by a regimental court-martial, shall, except in the case of mutiny or gross insubordination, be put in execution in time of peace without the leave in writing of the general or other officer commanding the district or station in which the court may be held; and no sentence of corporal punishment shall exceed fifty lashes." And sect. 24 authorises her Majesty, or the general or other officer authorised to confirm the sentences of court-martial, to mitigate the sentence of corporal punishment.

Thus, the Legislature has provided that such punishment should not be inflicted without due consideration, and inquiry into the case; and although some persons are fond of declaiming against its infliction upon soldiers or sailors in any case, we cannot think that all the experienced officers, who declare that the power of awarding the punishment is necessary in order to preserve discipline, are unfeeling martinets. It is impossible to provide against men of bad character enlisting; and officers only can tell how such men, unless they are checked by the fear of punishment, will corrupt and destroy young soldiers. The difference between the soldier or sailor and the civilian is, that in the case of the former the punishment is inflicted in the sight of his comrades, in that of the latter it is private. In the former case, an immediate warning to others may be salutary, and, therefore, the publicity of the punishment expedient. If, however, as is urged, such publicity destroys all shame in the soldier punished, and renders him callous for the future, it is worth consideration whether he also should not be flogged in private.

There is no doubt that the feelings revolt against the infliction of corporal punishment upon adults, but if adult criminals do not object to imprisonment, or, indeed, like its good fare and quiet life for a season, and if they are lost to all sense of shame, how are they to be treated? The judge who tries them will always exercise a discretion as to its infliction, regulated, as we have observed, by the character of the offence and of the criminal. It is in human nature to fear pain; and where pain only will deter from crime, it is mercy to inflict it.

THE greatest evils which prevailed under the old practice of the Court of Chancery arose from the Court taking such extreme care of the interests of suitors, that they were overwhelmed with the costs thereby occasioned. This tendency of the Court is still to be seen, and requires to be watched carefully, and when it becomes oppressive, to be from time to time corrected by the Legislature. A bill, having this object in view, intitled "An Act to amend the Settled Estates Act, 1856" (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), has been brought into Parliament by Lord Cranworth, and will, when it passes, effect much good, by saving unnecessary expenses. It seems, that under the 10th section of the Settled Estates Act, it was enacted, "That when the Court of Chancery should deem it expedient that any general powers of leasing any settled estates, conformably to the said act, should be vested in trustees, it might, by order, vest any such power accordingly either in the existing trustees of the settlement, or in any other persons, and that in every such case the Court, if it should think fit, might impose any conditions as to consents or otherwise on the exercise of such power."

Now, in order to protect the interests of persons interested in the settled estates affected by such powers, it became the practice of the Court to require that leases granted in pursuance of a power vested in any trustees or other persons, under the provisions of the said 10th section of the act, should be settled by the Court or by a Judge thereof; or otherwise should be made conformable with a model lease deposited in the chambers of the judge. The introduction of such a condition has been found to occasion delay and expense, and so to create great difficulties in carrying into execution the objects of the act; and as such conditions may in general be safely omitted, it is proposed, therefore, by Lord Cranworth's bill, that in orders to be hereafter made no such condition shall be inserted, save only in any case in which the parties applying for the order may desire it, or in which it shall appear to the Court that there is some special reason rendering the insertion of such a condition necessary or expedient.—(Sect. 1).

Moreover, in all cases of orders already made in pursuance of the 10th section of the act, in which any such condition has been inserted, it is proposed that any party interested may apply to the Court to alter and amend such order, by striking out such condition, which the Court may do, unless it shall appear that there is any special reason why in the case in question such a condition is necessary or expedient.—(Sect. 2).

The principle of this bill might be usefully extended to other cases. Many other instances might be found, in which the care of the Court loads suitors with great expenses without conferring upon them corresponding benefits. We may call attention particularly to the evils in which the interposition of the Court conveyancers has been rendered necessary, either by act of Parliament, or the orders by the Court of Chancery.

The result of business being referred to them is, that frequently delays are occasioned and expenses incurred, which might have been altogether avoided, if the monopoly created in their favour were abolished.

We hope Lord Cranworth will direct his attention to this growing evil.

DUMMY & CO.

We scarcely know whether or not to regret that Mr. Scholefield has been persuaded to compromise the great cause of credit without debit, by proceeding with his Partnership-law Amendment Bill after the insertion of Mr. T. Baring's amendment, requiring every partnership, trading with limited liability as to any of its members, to notify the fact, by using the cognomen of "Registered" in addition to its other name or names. A similar condition was recommended by Mr. Baron Bramwell, but it did not find favour with the commercial men who speak through Mr. Scholefield. They felt it—Mr. Arthur Ryland, one of the advocates of the measure, says—"to be an awkward requirement." But, with the spread of enlightened commercial notions, even such a customer as a registered limited partnership would soon cease to be regarded as awkward.

The main object of Mr. Scholefield's bill will be gathered from the following extracts and abstracts:—

S. 4. "Any person who, subject to the provisions of this act, shall lend, or contract to lend, money to any general partner or partners [i. e. a partner with unlimited liability], upon any contract under which he shall share profits, or profits and losses, shall thereupon become and be a limited partner with such general purchaser or purchasers: provided always, that any such contract, in respect of which the provisions of this act shall not be complied with, shall constitute the person lending the money a general partner with the person borrowing the same."

S. 9. To constitute a limited partnership, the partners must register their names and residences, distinguishing each limited partner, the nature of the business, the place where it is carried on, the name of the firm, and the amounts lent or to be lent, and the time or times when lent or to be lent, and when to be repaid; but not the shares in which profits are to be divided.

S. 5. "A limited partner shall not be liable to creditors of the partnership, except to the extent and in manner hereinafter mentioned."

S. 8. A limited partner shall be liable to contribute to payment of the partnership debts only under a winding-up suit, and then not in respect of any debts contracted after he ceased to be a limited partner, nor beyond the amount (if any) unpaid by him of the loan which he contracted to make to the general partner.

It was the adoption of Mr. Buchanan's amendment, striking out the words "or contract to lend" from clause 4, that broke the back of Mr. Scholefield's patience; and no wonder, for it necessitates the omission of the phantasmagoric 8th section, in which alone, after all the lights are turned down, a creditor quite in the dark may fancy he sees the shadow of a limited liability.

S. 12. The loan must not be repaid, wholly or in part, nor further secured, before the appointed time.

S. 13. A limited partner becomes a general partner if he violate any of the foregoing provisions, or, as principal or attorney, do any other act (except lending money as aforesaid, and ascertaining profits and losses) which before the act would have made him liable as a partner; if he acquiesce in the use by the firm of any other than the registered name; or if his full name is included in the registered name.

S. 14. A limited partnership is dissolved (as to any limited partner) when the appointed time for repayment of the loan arrives, whether it is repaid or not, and he may then take back his money without liability to contribute to the debts, although the firm be then insolvent, if it is not actually in course of being wound up.

S. 18. A clerk, manager, or servant in any business, may contract to receive a share of profits in lieu of, or in addition to, salary, without becoming liable as a partner, and the contract is not required to be registered.

The consideration in committee of the clauses subsequent to clause 4, is to be proceeded with after the Whitsuntide recess.

The following operation under the bill, as proposed by Mr. Scholefield, may be taken as a sample of the many which would, no doubt, be invented, all equally conducive to sound commercial activity and morality:—

A., B., and C. conduct a business, under the firm "A., "C.," or "C. & Co.," on the following terms (which they confide to the attentive and exclusive ears of the registrar of joint-stock companies, and such of his gossips as may drop in at his office in Serjeants'-inn, London, or send him a letter of inquiry, with a "proper" fee):—A. is "manager," and conducts the business, entitled to receive a fixed yearly salary, in respect of any arrears of which he may compete with any of the creditors of the firm, and also to receive nine-twentieths of the profits, his right to which does not make him even a limited partner. B. supplies the capital, for which he claims one-half of the profits; and C. takes down the shutters, with the nominal right to the remaining twentieth share, which he is glad to commute for 20s. a week, so long as that modest salary is duly paid. Mr. Baring's amendment would introduce the variation that the firm must trade under the style of "C. (or C. & Co.), registered"—a not very important difference, when we consider that the object of the bill is to enable orphans and widows, and other helpless mortals, to dip for honey out of the hive of industry, without liability to stings; so that the addition of "registered" can only suggest to the cautious but sympathetic creditor, or possible creditor, the notion that the ostensible partners combine philanthropy with acuteness; and imagination may shape as it will figures denoting their resources, because it is the amount of the limited partner's capital alone that is registered.

It will easily be perceived how great a step or stride this amendment of the law of partnership would be towards the simplification of mercantile accounts, and the use of a true and consistent method of single entry, in lieu of the old and cumbrous Italian system, by the simple expedient of abolishing one side of the account as practically useless.

The bill is in many respects very different from that of the last session, and on the whole considerably more advanced, or (shall we say?) red. But the remark we made in reviewing the former bill, as to the superfluity of registration, is equally applicable to the one before us, even with Mr. Baring's amendment.

"A. desires to share in the profits of a business—say to the extent of nine-tenths, or ninety-nine huncreditors—without being liable to the creditors at all; or, which is the same thing, beyond the sum of 10%. He may do it, the other parties concurring,

"1. By registering the names and addresses of himself and the other persons concerned, the nature of the business, the firm, and the time of lending and the time for repayment of the 10%. He need not register the share of profits to be taken by him.

"2. He may agree to be manager, director, clerk, or auditor of, or agent for the district of Whetstone Park for, the person or persons in whose name the business is carried on, receiving a sum in proportion to the profits (which proportion may be the proportion of 99-100ths, or even that of equality—absorbing the whole); and in this case no registration is necessary. Nor is it necessary that he should perform the duties of the office he undertakes to any greater extent than may suit his convenience, or otherwise than by deputy.

"The conditions, therefore, annexed to the provisions of a lending partner, are an empty form." (9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 105).

There is one grave omission in the bill—which we trust Mr. Scholefield will supply before it leaves the committee—we mean the omission of any indemnity to the limited partner, or the profit sharing manager, against claims by creditors in respect of dividends out of the capital or the creditors' fund, upon a mistaken estimate of profits. But even in its present imperfect and mutilated condition, the bill is well calculated to provide opportunity for some very stupendous mercantile effects.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Permit me to call the attention of your readers to the construction of the 200th section and model deed of the Bankrupt Act, 1861, so far as it affects the title to the copyhold estates of the debtor, and the mode of conveying such estates to a purchaser.

The 200th section provides, that when the assent of a certain majority of the creditors cannot be obtained, the debtor may execute a deed in the form given in the schedule, which deed "shall vest all the estate and effects of the debtor in the trustees of such deed;" and, by the deed, the debtor is made to convey "all his estate and effects" to the trustees absolutely. If there were nothing more, we should say the copyholds became vested in the trustees upon the execution of the deed, without any admittance, and may be surrendered by them to the purchaser in the ordinary manner. But the deed declares that the estate is to be applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors, in like manner as if the debtor had been at the date thereof duly adjudged bankrupt.

Now, in the case of a regular adjudication, the copyholds do not vest in the creditors' assignees, or only sub modo. The 117th section declares, that on the appointment of the creditors' assignee, "all the estate, both real and personal, of the bankrupt, shall be divested out of the official assignee, and vested in the creditors' assignee;" but the bankrupt's copyholds do not vest in the official assignee, for they are expressly excepted by the 142nd section of the act of 1849 (which is not repealed); and the 114th section of the act of 1861 empowers the Court to dispose of the copyholds, and by an order vest them in the purchaser. It is clear, then, that under the 117th section, assignees appointed by the Court do not take such an estate in the copyholds as will enable them to sell and surrender to a purchaser; and it was so held in Re Haines (6 Law T., N. S., 109). Moreover, the vesting the copyholds in the assignees has always been avoided.

If, then, the words "all the estate and effects" in the 117th section, are to be taken with some limitation, why not the same words in the 200th section and in the deed?

The 192nd section provides for deeds of trust when the required majority of the creditors assent; and the 197th section enacts, that the debtor, creditors, and trustees shall, in all matters relating to the debtor's estate, be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, and shall have the benefit of, and be liable to, all the provisions of the act, in the same or the like manner as if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt, and the creditors had proved, and the trustees had been appointed creditors' assignees under such bankruptcy; and the trustees and creditors shall, as between themselves and the debtor, and against third persons, have the same powers, rights, and remedies with respect to the debtor, and his estate and effects, as are possessed, or may be used or exercised, by assignees or creditors with respect to the bankrupt, or his estate and effects in bankruptcy; and except when the deed expressly provides otherwise, the Court is to determine all questions arising under the deed, according to the law and practice in bankruptcy, so far as they may be applicable, and shall have power to make and enforce all such orders as it would be authorised to do if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt, and his estate is administered in bankruptcy.

Upon the construction of these sections, the Lord Chancellor observes (Ex parte Morgan, in re Woodhouse, 9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 559), "As soon as a deed is entitled to the benefit of the 192nd section" (that is, has been duly executed, registered, &c.), "it was the object of the Legislature, by the 197th section, to give to all parties under that deed a power of resorting to the Court of Bankruptcy whenever it should be necessary so to do;" and the 197th section causes "the state of things under a trust-deed, to be precisely the same as if there had been a bankruptcy instead of a deed of composition." Again: in Ex parte Spyer, in re Joseph (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 949), "The whole effect of the 197th section, if it be properly attended to, construed, and appreciated, is to give to the deed, the moment it attains the character of a duly registered deed, a comprehensive effect upon all the estate and effects of the debtor, and the particular operation of making the positive and relative rights of the trustees and creditors claiming under it, the same as the rights of assignees and creditors under a fiat. This is still further exemplified by the 200th section, for where it is not competent to have a deed that shall answer entirely the requisites of the 192nd section, the model deed, which is given by the schedule, conveys all the estate and effects of the debtor in like manner as if he had become a bankrupt."

It would, therefore, appear, that, in his Lordship's opinion, the trustees, under the 200th section and model deed, take the same estate, neither more nor less, as assignees under an adjudication; and, as a consequence, that the estate is to be administered, that is, not only is the produce of the estate to be applied, but the estate disposed of, in the same manner; and that the copyholds are to be sold and vested in the purchaser by the Court under the 114th section, as in the case of a regular bankruptcy.

I have been induced to trouble you with these remarks, in consequence of having lately met with the case of a deed under the 200th section, where the trustees had been admitted to the copyholds, and it was insisted that they could alone make a title to a purchaser by surrender: the purchaser objected, and required an order of the Court; and the commissioner (Holroyd) declined to make any order, considering it unnecessary.

But to ascertain what is to be done under the model deed, and to give it effect, resort must be had to the provisions of the act in the case of an adjudication. How are new trustees to be appointed in case of death, &c.? In the same manner as if they had been assignees. What are the duties of the trustees? The same as the duties of assignees. And if the duties be the same, must not the powers be the same?

In short, does not the deed, after it has been allowed by the Court, and the other conditions of the act are fulfilled, place the debtor, creditors, and trustees, from the time of its execution, in the same position in every respect as if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt, and the trustees chosen and appointed assignees? If not, by what rules are the proceedings under it to be governed?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR'S EXCUSES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—While the enfranchisement of copyholds was voluntary, the act was seldom brought into operation, this because the expense was great, and the grievance very little felt; but when it became compulsory, the richer party was enabled to compel the poorer to enfranchise. I will also add, that manors are now frequently purchased on speculation that profits may be made from the compulsory enfranchisement. I have met with several cases of this sort in my own practice. This will account for the increase referred to by the Lord Chancellor, but does not in the slightest degree affect the question of sales under the Land Transfer Act.

Yours faithfully,

F. I. J.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, May 6.

The Lord Chancellor rose to call attention to the state of the law of debtor and creditor, as affecting the poorer classes, and to present a bill for the limitation of actions and processes for small debts, and to amend the acts relating to the county courts, and to confer on such courts a limited jurisdiction in equity. By a return which he moved for some time ago he found, that in the two years ending on the 31st December, 1863, no less than 17,979 persons were committed to prison for debts amounting to 309,777*l.*, and actually spent 257,251 days in prison. Now, out of that large number of prisoners who had incurred that great amount of confinement, he found that for one cause alone, viz. on the ground of not having satisfied the judgment, and costs, by persons who had not the ability to do so, no less than 17,850 persons were committed to prison, and the number of days which they spent in prison was 253,860. Comparing that with the figures he had previously quoted, their Lordships would observe, that this was a great and terrible source of injustice; for he found that the liberty of many of these men was taken away for sums of money so small as 1*s.* 6*d.*, 3*s.* 1*d.*, 1*s.* 10*d.*, and 2*s.* 9*d.*, and one person was actually committed to prison for several days for 9*d.*; and the sum total of the debts due on all the judgments at the time of the committals amounted only to 63,438*l.* Of the 17,979 persons, which, for the purpose of round numbers, he would call 18,000, the greater portion belonged to the operative classes, artisans, and agricultural labourers; but the artisans' wages were rather more than the agricultural labourers'. Could any system be more founded in error than this—that where, as the artisan or labourer had no wealth, except his ability to labour, that he should be subjected to the operation of a law which shut him up in prison, and deprived him of the power of exerting that labour—that condemned him to idleness—that exposed him to the contamination of a prison—and, after a certain period of time, sent him forth a degraded and depraved person, with the probability of his being unable to again obtain work without considerable difficulty? Besides that, he begged their Lordships to consider the evils that fell upon society by the operation of this law. To this loss of productive labour must be added, the loss which society had to bear in consequence by the increased charge on the county rates for the maintenance of the prisoners—by the increase in the amount of poor rates from those who were dependent on the productive head of the family being thrown in many cases upon the parish, and by the aggravation of the debtor's burthen by the additional costs which were added to the debt, which thereby removed to a greater distance of time the possibility of his being relieved from his debt. He wished to point out the difference between the law according to the county court system and that regarding the rest of the community. When the first great step was taken against imprisonment for debt, that imprisonment was divided into two classes, namely, the debtor and the criminal classes. By the change which had taken place in the law, no debtor could remain in prison for more than fourteen days. He had no reason to be discontented with that part of the working of the act. On the contrary, he referred to it with great satisfaction, seeing that the Queen's Prison, which had once been the abode of vice, idleness, and profligate dissipation, was now converted into an hospital. Now, he asked their Lordships whether a creditor should have the right to throw a poor debtor into prison when it was evident that the unfortunate man had nothing whatever but the fruits of his own industry to depend upon for his living. He believed that a contrary system was calculated to produce habits of prudence on the part of the poor. And those were the objects to which legislation should be directed. He would now explain the means by which he proposed to remedy the existing evil. He professed, in the first place, to abrogate the existing law which gave power to the judge to commit the debtor, if he were satisfied that he possessed the ability to pay. He would introduce a clause into his bill which would require the judge, in estimating the ability of the debtor, to take into consideration the whole of his circumstances. The result of his measure, if passed, would be this—that, for debts contracted by fraud, the debtor would be liable to criminal punishment; but a mere debtor would be liable to imprisonment once only for the same debt; but that imprisonment should not be a mere farce, but a reality. If the debtor had been committed for any one of these criminal acts specified in the bill, he proposed that he should be imprisoned for a period not exceeding two calendar months, but that he should not be subject to any further imprisonment. He provided, therefore, by the bill, that whenever a debtor should be brought up, and the judge should have reason to believe either that he had no means, or insufficient means, either present or future, to provide, within a reasonable time, for the discharge of the debt, the judge should bring before him all the creditors of that debtor, and then ascertain what amount of load might with propriety be placed on the shoulders of the debtor, and that that amount should be paid into court, and divided among the creditors. The administration of the law should be so guided, that, in the case of the poor insolvent debtor, something corresponding to the course of the new bankrupt law should be extended to him. He proposed also that no action should lie, no judgment be given, for any score for beer or ale consumed on the premises of any ale or beer house. With respect to small debts under 20*l.*, there was no reason why there should not be enacted with respect to them some shorter period, both with regard to suing, and also with regard to the enforcement of judgment. He proposed, therefore, that the debt should be sued for within one year of the last item being contracted, and within one year of the last judgment on the judgment debt having been made. He had gone through the first part of the bill. He would now mention the provisions of the second portion. Their Lordships were aware that when these courts were established their jurisdiction was limited to matters of law, as contradistinguished from matters of equity. Suppose a poor man died and left a small property of 80*l.*, 90*l.*, or 100*l.*, he might leave a widow and four or five children. There was no resort to the county court for them to obtain distribution, as that tribunal was at present constituted. They could not get relief without going to the Court of Chancery—a court utterly inadequate in such trifling cases. Take again the case of a partnership, in which the value of the goods might not exceed 300*l.* or 400*l.*; in case of disputes among the partners no redress could be had except by resorting to the same court. In all these and similar cases he proposed to clothe the county court judges with summary equitable jurisdiction, to be administered promptly, economically, without much form and without much delay; and he hoped to hear that this extension of their power would tend greatly to the relief of the poorer classes. There was another subject to which he would direct their Lordships' attention. When the county court system was established, the power of suing for small debts in the superior courts was not taken away. He wished, therefore, to check this practice, and he thought that the provisions of the bill would be found sufficient to prevent the infliction of such injustice. His desire was to make the law as equitable for the labouring and operative classes as it was for the poorer classes of the community; and with the earnest hope that their Lordships would think this subject worthy of their attention, he trusted that they would, with some modifications perhaps, approve the clauses of this bill, and thereby make such an addition to our legislation as would tend very greatly to the benefit of the labouring classes of the country.

Lord Cranworth having made a few observations,

The Lord Chancellor said he had neglected to state that there was a provision that the householder's goods should not be taken away, and that the labourer should not be deprived of the tools by which he obtained his livelihood.

The bill was read a first time.

Monday, May 9.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, May 5.

Mr. A. Mills asked the Attorney-General when the Courts of Justice (Money) Bill would be introduced by the Government.

The Attorney-General intended to introduce it next week.

The Attorney-General, in reply to Mr. Hadfield, said he did not think he should be able to move the second reading of the Church Building and New Parishes Acts Assessment Bill to-morrow, but hoped to be able to make a statement on the subject before Whitsuntide.

In reply to Mr. Liddell, Sir G. Grey said the Government intended to introduce a bill on the subject of highways, and if it should be read a second time, to refer it to a select committee.

The Under-Secretaries Indemnity Bill was read a third time.

The Local Government Supplemental Bill passed through committee.

The Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

The Joint-stock Companies (Foreign Companies) Bill was read a second time.

Sir G. Grey obtained leave to bring in a bill for amending the law relating to gaols, and for the discontinuance of certain gaols.

The Solicitor-General obtained leave to bring in a bill for the amendment of the law relating to the mitigation of penalties.

Friday, May 6.

The Lord Advocate brought in the Administration of Justice (Scotland) Bill, which was read a first time.

Sir G. Grey, in answer to Mr. Hadfield, said the second reading of the Church Building and New Parishes Acts Amendment Bill would be postponed until the 29th of this month.

Mr. D. Seymour asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he was aware that the practice still prevailed of transporting convicts and vagrants from the Channel Islands to Southampton and other southern seaports. He pointed out that about 1000 individuals had been transported from Jersey and Guernsey to Southampton; that of these many were burglars; those transported for life were sent to New South Wales, and those transported for a period of five or six years were sent to Southampton, Plymouth, and Weymouth; nor was a trial always had, but the vagrant was allowed to go to England without a prosecution. The evil the petitioners complained of had been existing for many years.

Sir G. Grey said, that no native of Guernsey had been transported from the island since 1840, and he, therefore, thought the hon. and learned gentleman had been misinformed. If any different information was received from Jersey he would communicate with the hon. and learned gentleman, who had, perhaps, better move for the correspondence on the subject.

The Under-Secretaries Indemnity Bill went through committee.

The Local Government Supplemental Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Chief Rents (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

Monday, May 9.

The Attorney-General for Ireland, in answer to a question from Mr. Hassard, said it was his intention to introduce a measure to amend the laws relating to "Charitable donations and bequests" in Ireland.

Lord Proby, Comptroller of the Queen's Household, appeared at the bar of the House, and stated that her Majesty had given directions, that a royal commission should issue to inquire into the operation of the law under which the punishment of death is inflicted, and to report whether it is desirable to make any alteration therein.

The Under-Secretaries Indemnity Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Some amendments in the Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill were considered, and agreed to.

The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Bill was recommitted, for the purpose of making certain amendments, which were agreed to.

The Admiralty Lands and Works Bill passed through committee.

The Joint-stock Companies (Foreign Countries) Bill passed through committee.

The House went into committee on the Partnership-law Amendment Bill.

On clause 3,

Mr. T. Baring moved as an amendment, that the word "registered" should be attached to every company which adopted the provisions of this bill.

After some debate, the committee then divided. The numbers were—

For the amendment	58
Against	43

Majority for the amendment .. 15

On clause 4,

Mr. Buchanan moved the omission of the words "or contract to lend," which provided, that a person might contract to lend money, without paying it.

Mr. Scholefield said, the clause was only carrying out the principle of a company whose shares were not all called up.

Mr. Baring supported the amendment. Suppose a person contracting to lend money should fail, what claim would the limited partnership have upon that estate?

The committee again divided—

For the amendment	46
Against it	39

----------	----	----	----	---

Mr. Scholefield said, after the decisions of the committee, he thought it would be useless to proceed further with the bill; and therefore he moved, that the bill be withdrawn.

After observations from several members,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested, that if his hon. friend would take a little time to consider, and ascertain the feelings of the House, he believed that he might, if he persevered, pass his bill, although it might take some time.

Mr. Scholefield said he would adopt the suggestion, and, with the consent of the committee, move that the chairman report progress, and he would proceed with the bill after the recess.

Mr. W. E. Forster thought, that as the President of the Board of Trade had voted one way, and the Attorney-General the other, it would be better that his hon. friend should drop the bill, and that it should be thrown upon the Government to take it up on their own responsibility.

The Attorney-General said he was favourable to the principle of the bill, although he had voted against the hon. member on the last division. He hoped the hon. gentleman would reconsider his intention to withdraw the bill.

The Chairman then reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Tuesday, May 10.

Sir G. Bowyer moved for leave to bring in a bill to enable the benchers of the Inns of Court to appoint judicial committees in certain cases, and to give the necessary powers to such committees.

Mr. W. Ewart seconded the motion; and leave was given to bring in the bill.

Wednesday, May 11.

The second reading of the Poor-law Acts (Ireland) Bill was postponed to the 29th June.

Mr. Heygate moved the second reading of the County Bridges Bill; but the bill, after some debate, was withdrawn. The Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Admiralty Lands and Works Bill passed through committee.

The Joint-stock Companies (Foreign Countries) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

At the ANNUAL MEETING of the PROPRIETORS, held on THURSDAY, the 4th February, 1864, at the LONDON TAVERN, Bishopsgate-street, the following Report for the Year ending the 31st December, 1863, was read by the Secretary.

WILLIAM NICOL, ESQ., M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

REPORT.

The Directors, in submitting to the Proprietors the Accounts of the Bank for the Half-year ending the 31st December, 1863, have much satisfaction in reporting that the Net Profit for the Six Months, after deducting all charges, amounts to 84,325*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, which, added to 14,343*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* brought forward from the last Account, results in a total of 98,668*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*

Out of this Sum the Directors recommend that the usual Dividend of 6*l.* per Cent., together with the Bonus of 6*l.* per Cent., be declared for the Half-year, making, with the Dividend paid in August last, 18*l.* per Cent. for the Year. They further propose to carry 10,000*l.* to the Reserve Fund, making that Fund 100,000*l.*, leaving 16,668*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.* to be carried forward to Profit and Loss new Account.

In consequence of the great increase of the Business of the Bank, the Directors consider it advisable further to increase the Capital of the Company, by the issue of 7500 New Shares, to be offered, pro rata, amongst the Proprietors, as they appeared in the Register on the 3rd instant, the date when the Transfer Books of the Company were closed; such Shares to be issued at the price of 40*l.* each, being a premium of 20*l.* per Share. Full particulars of the Issue will be transmitted by Circular to each Proprietor.

This operation will produce 300,000*l.*, out of which 150,000*l.* will be added to the Capital of the Company, and 150,000*l.* (being the Premium on the Shares), will be added to the Reserve Fund, raising the former to 750,000*l.* and the latter to 250,000*l.*—together One Million.

The Directors regret having to announce the decease of HENRY OVERTON, Esq., for many years one of the Auditors of the Bank. This creates a vacancy in the Auditorship, which it is in the power of the Meeting to fill up.

The Directors retiring by rotation are—

PHILIP PATTON BLYTH, Esq.,

EDWARD HUGGINS, Esq.,

and WILLIAM LEE, Esq., M.P.,

all of whom are eligible for re-election, and offer themselves accordingly.

The Dividend will be payable at the Head Office, or at any of the Branches, on and after Monday, the 15th instant.

NINE-TENTHS of the Total Profits are divided among the Assured. Considerably more than one-tenth of the Profits is derived from Policies which do not participate in the Profits, so that THE ASSURED HAVE LARGER BONUSES THAN IF THEY FORMED A MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, and received the whole of the Profits derived from their own Policies.

The last BONUS averaged about SIXTY PER CENT. on the Premiums paid, and TWO PER CENT. PER ANNUM on the Sums assured.

The EXPENSES of Management are less than FIVE PER CENT. on the Income.

The PREMIUMS are calculated for every half-year of age.

The Policies of this Society, in the hands of third parties, are not vitiated by SUICIDE, or by the Life assured proceeding beyond the limits allowed.

NOTICES of ASSIGNMENT of Policies registered and acknowledged free of charge. Printed Forms for such Notices furnished when required. The usual Commission allowed to Solicitors introducing Insurances, the Commission being continued to the person originally entitled to it as long as the Policy remains in force, through whatever channel the Premium may be paid.

LOANS granted on the Society's Policies, on Reversions, Life Interests, and other approved Security.

The Annual Reports and full Statements of Account are regularly printed, and may be obtained on application.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 21, 1864.

It is not long since we noticed the great benefits which had been conferred upon India, by the enactment, in the year 1860, of the Indian Penal Code, which was originally prepared by the Indian Law Commissioners, when the late Lord Macaulay was President of that body, and which was laid before the Governor-General of India in Council in the year 1837.

In the year 1861 a Royal Commission was issued to Sir John Romilly, M. R.; Sir William Erle, C. J.; Sir Edward Ryan, Knt.; Mr. Robert Lowe, late Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education; Sir J. S. Willes, J.; and John Macpherson Macleod, Esq., as Commissioners, with the assistance of William Macpherson, Esq., as Secretary, and Neil Benjamin Edmonstone Baillie, Esq., as Assistant Secretary, "to prepare for India a body of substantive law, in preparing which the law of England should be used as a basis, but which, once enacted, should itself be the law of India on the subjects it embraced.

By a letter, dated the 14th December, 1861, from the Secretary of State for India, the commissioners were requested to report the result of their labours on one branch of civil law before entering on the consideration of another branch, as the plan of successive reports would greatly facilitate the necessary measures which would have to be taken in India for giving effect to their recommendations.

The commissioners finding that, by various classes of persons in India not professing the Hindoo or the Mahomedan religion, a want of substantive civil law was most complained of, and that a law to regulate the devolution of property on death was most urgently required by those classes, they, in the first instance, directed their attention to the preparation of a law of succession and inheritance, generally applicable to all classes other than the Hindoos and Mahomedans, both of which great portions of the population of India have laws of their own upon the subject.

The commissioners appear to have applied themselves to their task with great energy; but although they made their first report so far back as the 23rd June, 1863, it has only just been printed and presented to Parliament.

The commissioners have termed the subject of their report, "Rules of Succession and Inheritance;" but, upon examination, it has a much wider application, and comprehends not merely those rules, but also rules as to the making of wills and codicils, as to legacies of different kinds, the construction of wills, the appointment of executors, as to donations mortis causa, probate of wills, letters of administration; the duties of executors and administrators, such as the administration of assets, the assent to and payment of legacies, when annuities and legacies become payable, what interest is payable thereon, when they ought to be refunded, and as to the liabilities of executors and administrators.

Although the report is based upon the law of England, it in some material respects differs from it.

Thus, it is proposed by the general law of India, to make no distinction between the succession to movable and immovable property, the devolution of which is to be governed by one system of rules.

In one or two cases, provisions affecting rights as between living persons have been introduced.

It is proposed that a man shall not, through the mere operation of law, acquire by marriage any interest in his wife's property during her life, but that she shall continue to possess the same rights, with reference to it, as if she were unmarried, and shall have full power to dispose of her property by will.

It is proposed, in case of intestacy, to give a widow the same rights in respect of all the property of her husband, as a widow has in England in respect of her husband's personal property; providing at the same time, that when there is a widow, and no kindred of the intestate, the whole property shall belong to her, instead of one half going to her, and the other half to the Crown.

The husband, where he survives his wife, is to have such rights in respect of her property as the wife has in respect of his property where she is the survivor.

The rule of English law, by which, in cases of total intestacy, anything which a child may have received from his father in his lifetime, by way of advancement, is deducted from his share in his father's estate, is proposed to be omitted, as being likely to be productive of difficult investigations and litigation.

It is proposed to take the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26) as the basis of the law relative to the execution and revocation of wills, with some modifications in its provisions as to execution, which would be likely to cause frequent intestacy. But wills may be made by persons of either sex at the age of eighteen.

The English rules, relative to the satisfaction of debts by legacies, and of portions by legacies, and the ademption of legacies by portions, have been discarded.

Provisions are inserted for defining expressions used in wills to denote kindred and representation, and for giving the legacy absolutely to the first taker, where words are added which (in legal phrase) are words of limitation and not of purchase.

The power of creating successive interests in property by will, is restricted, by providing that interests so created shall not extend beyond the lifetime of persons living at the testator's death, and the minority of some person who shall be in existence at the expiration of that period, and to whom, if he attain the age of eighteen, the thing bequeathed is to belong. There are provisions also, that a bequest to a person not born at the testator's death must comprise the whole of the interest of the testator in the thing bequeathed; and that where, at the time fixed for the payment of a legacy, the person for whom it was intended has not come into existence, the bequest shall have no effect.

There are also provisions, that directions to accumulate the income arising from any property shall be void, and also against death-bed bequests, to charitable uses, by persons having near relatives.

The commissioners have abstained from introducing into India the very refined distinctions which the Court of Chancery has, in questions relating to personal property, borrowed from the Ecclesiastical Courts.

They very wisely, in our opinion, do not propose to extend to India the rule which enables an executor to pay any creditor (whether himself or another person) in preference to another creditor of equal degree.

They also provide, that funeral and death-bed expenses, and charges of probate and administration, are to be first paid, then wages due to any labourer, artisan, or domestic servant employed by the deceased; and that in respect of no other debt shall a creditor be entitled to a preference, either by reason of its being secured by deed under seal, or any other account.

Although the operation of the proposed Code will be much limited by its not being applicable to persons professing the Hindoo or the Mahomedan religion, its object is, as the commissioners say, "ultimately to introduce one uniform system applicable to all classes, wherever this can be properly or safely accomplished."

In following the example set by the framers of the Indian Penal Code, the commissioners have made a copious use of illustrations. We give one extract, which shews how the Code is framed:—

"281. An executor or administrator has power to dispose of the property of the deceased, either wholly or in part, in such manner as he may think fit.

"Illustrations.

"(a). The deceased has made a specific bequest of part of his property. The executor, not having assented to the bequest, sells the subject of it:—The sale is valid.

"(b). The executor, in the exercise of his discretion, mortgages a part of the immovable estate of the deceased:—The mortgage is valid.

"282. If an executor or administrator purchases, either directly or indirectly, any part of the property of the deceased, the sale is voidable at the instance of any person interested in the property sold.

"283. When there are several executors or administrators, the powers of all may, in the absence of any direction to the contrary, be exercised by any one of them who has proved the will.

"Illustrations.

"(a). One of several executors has power to release a debt due to the deceased.

"(b). One has power to surrender a lease.

"(c). One has power to sell the property of the deceased, movable or immovable.

"(d). One has power to assent to a legacy.

"(e). One has power to indorse a promissory note payable to the deceased.

"(f). The will appoints A., B., C., and D. to be executors, and directs that two of them shall be a quorum. No act can be done by a single executor.

"284. Upon the death of one or more of several executors or administrators, all the powers of the office become vested in the survivors or survivor."

This specimen of the proposed Code shews how the commissioners have performed their work. First, the rule of law is laid down, and then, when necessary, it is followed by illustrations.

The commissioners wish to have it understood, that the correctness of the decision contained in any illustration is not to be questioned in the administration of the law. The illustrations are not merely examples of the law in operation, but are the law itself, shewing by examples what it is.

Difficulties will, of course, arise as to the construction of the rules, leading to differences of opinion among judges. Cases, also, will doubtless arise where the Code is silent; and the result would be, if nothing is done to prevent it, that the Code will be incumbered with a mass of comments and decisions.

In order to prevent this great evil, the commissioners, agreeing in this respect with the framers of the Penal Code of India, think that "the Civil Code ought, at intervals of only a few years, to be revised and so amended as to make it contain, as completely as possible, in the form of definitions of rules, or of illustrations, everything which may from time to time be deemed fit to be made a part of it, leaving nothing to rest as law on the authority of previous judicial decisions." Each successive edition, after such a revision, it is suggested, should be enacted as law, and would contain, sanctioned by the Legislature, all judge-made law of the preceding interval deemed worthy of being retained. On these occasions, too, the opportunity should be taken to amend the body of the law under revision in every practicable way; and especially to provide such new rules of law as might be required by the rise of new interests and new circumstances in the progress of society.

The commissioners also suggest, for the due administration of the law under the proposed Code, if adopted, that when cases of difficulty occur, no resort should be had to any other system of law for the purpose of authoritatively solving an ambiguity or supplying an omission, and that the judges must decide cases unprovided for by the Code in the manner they consider most consistent with the principles of justice, equity, and good conscience.

Although the proposed Code is, doubtless, susceptible of some improvements, we think that the commissioners deserve great praise for the energy and learning they have shewn in preparing in so short a time a Code upon such an important branch of the law as that which they have selected, and which is, as we have already observed, much more extensive than we might, from the title given to it by the commissioners, at first sight suppose. If they proceed with their work as they have commenced it, our vast Indian empire will at no distant period be possessed of a Code which will bear comparison with any yet framed, and promulgated; and if the advice of the commissioners is followed, the body of the Code will in future be from time to time so amended, as that its symmetry will not be injured by supplemental laws added to, but not incorporated within it—a fate which befel the Digest of Justinian, to which were appended, at no distant time after its promulgation, the Code, the Novella, and the Edicts of the same Emperor.

The commissioners appointed to prepare a body of substantive civil law for India, have set an example which might with advantage be followed by those who may attempt to prepare a similar body of laws for England.

At a time when the subject of law reports and law reporters is exciting so much attention in the country, and there is manifested a strong inclination on the part of some persons, if possible, to suppress independent reports, and to have official reporters, it is well to see how the system of official reporting works in other countries.

In the United States, the reporters are officers of the court, and receive in that capacity, we believe, regular salaries. It has become the fashion to refer to them as models. Let us see how far the same opinion prevails in the United States.

The Legal Intelligencer of Philadelphia makes the following remarks upon the mode in which the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States have for many years been put together and published:—

"The reports of the Supreme Court of the United States have been for many years past—ever since the time, in fact, that Mr. Wheaton ceased to report them—eminently discreditable to our professional character abroad, and a vexatious burthen every way to those among us who were obliged to read them at home. They have been, in some cases, almost untelligible except to the counsel who argued, or to the judges who decided, them. The careless or stupid way wherein whole deeds, and wills, and documents of every kind have been thrust in bodily, when the case may turn upon two lines, or but two words of them; the whole way, in short, in which the cases are stated, and the arguments of counsel are not stated—unintelligible itself, and making unintelligible every other part of the proceeding—has long disgusted the Profession, and prevented any one from reading the Federal reports of cases in their last adjudication if they could possibly help it. We say little of the miserable shifts that have been sometimes resorted to for swelling the volumes; considerations, these last, prompted by motives quite beneath the attention or even the contempt of an honourable mind. But carelessness, stupidity, disorder in stating and reporting the body of the cases, is not all. The Profession, for forty years, has had to complain of acts of incompetency and error, by the operation of which the decisions of the Court—the Court of supreme authority throughout the land—are, in effect, falsified, the Bar misled, and the law abused. We charge, that in repeated instances, in the syllabuses of cases, the decisions of the Court have been grossly misrepresented, and that it is certified by the reporter to the Profession that the Court has decided that which the Court has not decided."

It will be seen from this extract, that some of the official reports of the United States are in worse odour even than our own authorised reports.

THE Naval Prize Acts Repeal Bill, which it is proposed should commence on the commencement of the Naval Prize Act, 1864, and the Naval Agency and Distribution Act, 1864, expressly repeals fifty-six acts or parts of acts of Parliament, commencing with stat. 6 Ann. c. 13 and c. 65, relating wholly or mainly to naval prize of war, and matters connected therewith, or with the discipline or management of the navy, which have either ceased to be in force, or, on the commencement of the Naval Prize Act, 1864, and the Naval Agency and Distribution Act, 1864, will cease to be in force.

This measure shews, in one branch out of many, how our statute law admits of consolidation.

Levi's International Commercial Law. Second Edition.
[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes.]

"It cannot be doubted that uniformity in the laws by which commerce is regulated in different countries would be, if it could be obtained, of immense advantage to commerce generally. Nothing would tend more to give public opinion a proper direction than such a publication as yours, where the legislative enactments of different countries upon the same subject would be found in juxtaposition, and where the ready means thus afforded for comparing their relative merits would infallibly lead to a certain degree of assimilation, the advantage and convenience of which would be obvious; or should it not lead to this result, the publication would, at all events, afford to the mercantile world the means of knowing the points of difference in the various commercial codes on which it is most important for them to be correctly informed."

These words form part of a letter which was addressed to the author of the above work by the late Prince Consort, and appeared in the first edition. They express the soundest wisdom and good sense, and also truly define the principle on which Mr. Levi has framed his book. The object of the work, as Mr. Levi tells us in his Preface, is "to bring the fundamental principles of the law merchant, and the rules which have been superadded to them in different countries, into contact with each other, so that we may profit by each other's experience, and at the same time gather materials for the attainment of solid and permanent progress in mercantile legislation. The chief advantage of such a work is the ready access it affords to the existing laws of the principal countries in the world."

Any lawyer will understand, that if Mr. Levi has really carried out the design thus announced, he must have devoted an extraordinary amount of learning and labour and time upon the book, and that he must also have brought to bear great ability and soundness of judgment, if he has done his work well. Mr. Levi's reputation as an author and a jurist is so well established that there could be little doubt as to the character of the book whose merits we are now discussing, and we can sincerely recommend it as a clear, concise, and correct compendium of the commercial law of this country and her colonies, and of the various foreign countries mentioned in the title-page. In the first volume there are most useful chapters on partnership, and on the statutory law of joint-stock companies. That on partnership states the law of foreign countries as well as of Great Britain with respect to such associations, and explains the system prevailing in France of partnerships in commandite—bodies formed of several individuals, some of whom are responsible to the full extent of their property, others with a limited liability—a combination which Mr. Levi considers to be formed on sound principles, and which, we believe, there is a desire among some persons to establish in this country; and this is an instance of the advantage of such a work as Mr. Levi's, which, putting, as it were, side by side, the law which regulates partnerships in this country with that which regulates them in others, enables us to contrast the two, to see the merits and demerits of each, and to improve our own where improvement is required. The same remark will apply to the other subjects treated of in the book, among which the subject of the bankrupt laws of Great Britain and other countries has evidently been handled by the learned author with great care and research.

It may be, that notwithstanding the facilities of intercourse between different countries, many years must elapse before anything like a common code of commercial law will be established, but it is clear that such books as these must have a tendency to promote an object so desirable; and on this account, as well as on account of the merits of the book itself, we trust it will be extensively read.

Mr. Levi does not profess to do more than explain what are the laws of different countries on the various branches of commercial law. He abstains from entering at any length upon the subject of the conflict of those laws. We hope at some future time to see such a work proceed from his pen. A clear and concise treatise on this branch of international law is, we venture to think, still a desideratum in legal literature.

The Ocean, the River, and the Shore. Part I.—Navigation. By J. W. WILCOCK, Q. C., and A. WILCOCK, M. A., Barrister-at-Law.

[Routledge, Warne, & Routledge.]

THIS is an original work, the learned authors of which, by their very Preface, invite criticism, for they state there that "their object is to shew what is law, rather than what has been enunciated and accepted as law." This is a tolerably bold sentence, if the meaning of it is, that the authors propound in the book their own views of law as the correct views, and set them up as superior to the decisions of the Courts.

There is much learning, much labour, and a considerable amount of earnestness expended on this book, but, in most parts of it, it is as unlike a law book as any we have ever read. No doubt, the authors state in their Preface, that it is intended "rather for the merchant, the mariner, the riparian proprietor, the fisherman, the jurist, the general reader, than for the lawyer." Now, we should say that there is too little law in it for the lawyer, and too much law for the other classes of individuals mentioned in the Preface. Indeed, there are parts which seem to be rather intended for the pulpit; for instance, paragraph 248, which runs thus:—

"The armies of the Chaldeans are marshalled round the merchant city. The prophets of Salem pour forth their denunciations against thee, and the vials of their wrath on the regions of the Nile. For thirteen years thy palaces have resounded with the clangour of arms, but thy navies guard thy island, and ride triumphant on the sea. The Lydian, and the Lycian, and the Persian, hang their shields on thy bastions, and array their thousands on thy walls. The squadrons of Togarmath are mounted in thy streets, and the Egyptian hosts are advancing."

Par. 249. "Vain are the denunciations of the prophet; the fury of his hatred is vain. The armies of Babylon are returning. The siege of the merchant city has failed."

We would refer also to chapter xiv on the subject of Recognition, as another specimen of the quaintness and peculiarities of the style. With the greatest respect for its learned authors, we cannot but think that it would have been better to have propounded their views more concisely, and to have forborne from passages similar to those which we have cited. They are not suitable to the nature of the subjects discussed, and they are not likely to promote a desire to read the book in those who really wish to study those subjects. We think that there is much useful knowledge to be acquired from the perusal, but that that knowledge would have been presented in a more inviting shape if the matter had been condensed, and the style in some portions of the work less inflated.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, May 12.

The Registration of County Voters (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

The Local Government Supplemental Bill was read a second time.

The Under-Secretaries Indemnity Bill was read a second time.

The Common-law Procedure (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill passed through committee.

The Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange (Ireland) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Bill was also read a third time, and passed.

The Marquis of Westmeath moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty for a copy of any memorial received by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or the Irish Government, praying for the release of Michael Duigan, Patrick Duigan, and Patrick Egan, three prisoners confined in the county gaol of Westmeath, convicted at the summer assizes of 1861 of agrarian offences, or any of them, and of any written communication forwarding the same, and recommending their enlargement to the Irish Government. The noble Marquis considered that it was owing to the capricious interference of the present Lord Lieutenant that agrarian offences were so numerous in Ireland, for, by his meddling with the sentences passed upon prisoners, by shortening the term of imprisonment, the people had ceased to respect the law.

The Earl of Donoughmore said it was rumoured that the person who brought the case before the Lord Lieutenant was one of the members of the county, and that his constituents being anxious to have the men released, brought, through him, a pressure of political influence on the Lord Lieutenant.

Earl Granville said the House would understand that he did not object to produce the memorial, and any letters of a public nature which accompanied it; not the communications between the judges and the Government, and the confidential communications.

The motion was agreed to.

Friday, May 13.

The royal assent was given by commission to the following bills:—The Customs and Inland Revenue; Charitable Insurances Inrolments; Land Drainage (Provisional Order); High Court of Bombay; Vestry Cess Abolition (Ireland); Court of Chancery (Dispatch of Business); Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange (Ireland); Joint-stock Companies (Foreign Countries); and to some private bills.

Lord Chelmsford said, within the last half-hour some very important returns had been placed in his hands relative to the county courts. This measure was one of a most important character, and he thought the returns should have been laid on the table at an earlier date. Under the circumstances, he must ask the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack to postpone the second reading of his bill, which stood on the paper for this day.

The Lord Chancellor said he would postpone the second reading till the first day upon which the House met after the recess.

The order was postponed accordingly.

The Regius Professorship of Oxford Bill, after some debate, was lost by a majority of thirty, upon the previous question being moved by Lord Redesdale.

The Registration of County Voters (Ireland) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Under-Secretaries Indemnity Bill went through committee.

The Common-law Procedure (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill, with amendments, was considered.

Their Lordships then adjourned to Monday, the 23rd May.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, May 12.

The Railway Companies Powers Bill was read a second time.

The Railways Construction Facilities Bill was read a second time.

The Naval Prize Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Sir G. Grey obtained leave to bring in a bill for amending the law relating to seats in the House of Commons by persons holding certain public offices.

Friday, May 13.

THE GIPSEY CASE IN CORNWALL.

Sir G. Grey.—I answered a question the other evening of the hon. member opposite (Mr. Hunt) with regard to the committal of some gipsies in Cornwall for sleeping under a tent. Since then I have written to the magistrate requesting him to furnish me with the minutes of evidence, and the report of the case, and it turns out that they were committed under the Vagrant Act, and not for sleeping under a tent. I have received a letter from the magistrate, which, in justice to him, I desire to read to the House. It is as follows:—

“Lelant Vicarage, May 12.

“Having received this morning your letter of the 10th inst., requesting me to furnish you with a full report of the case of the committal of the gipsies by me, I beg to communicate to you the following particulars:—At Redruth, some few days before the committal, one of the them was apprehended by the police for vagrancy, and was discharged on her promising to leave the neighbourhood; instead of doing which she was found the following day at Camborne, only three miles off, telling fortunes. On another day subsequent, a man and woman of the party were found sleeping together under a waggon which did not belong to them, and again cautioned by the police. On the Saturday previous to my committal the whole party were found on the estate of Trellissick, in the parish of St. Erth, where they did a great deal of injury, breaking down trees and lighting fires, when the police again cautioned them, and finding them there again on Monday apprehended them, and brought them to me. They had passed through the western part of the county, between Redruth and St. Erth, begging and telling fortunes. The superintendent of police had given particular direction to the police to watch them, as there had been been many thefts committed in that part of the county, and this party of gipsies had been suspected of being connected with them. When the party were brought before me I examined them individually and collectively, and found that they had no visible means of subsistence, and could give no satisfactory account of themselves. Under these circumstances, for the safety of the country, I considered it my duty to commit them."

The House adjourned till Thursday, the 19th May.

CAMBRIDGE, May 10.—Proposed New System of Examination.—The Syndicale, appointed on the 25th February, 1864, have made a report to the Senate, recommending the following special examination in law for ordinary degrees:—"That there shall be an examination, beginning on the Monday next but one before the general admission to the B.A. degree, in the Easter Term, in the following branches of law, viz. 1. Justinian's Institutes, in the original Latin, book 2, and book 3 from tit. 13 to the end. 2. A work on English law. 3. Lord Brougham's History of the Rise and Progress of the English Constitution, or the elements of Hindu and Mahomedan law. That the paper in Justinian's Institutes shall consist of passages for translation, and questions upon the subject. That the Board of Legal Studies shall issue notice of the work or portion of a work selected in English law in the preceding Michaelmas Term."

By Order of the Directors,

WM. McKEWAN, General Manager.

At the ANNUAL MEETING of the PROPRIETORS, held on THURSDAY, the 4th February, 1864, at the LONDON TAVERN, Bishopsgate-street, the following Report for the Year ending the 31st December, 1863, was read by the Secretary.

WILLIAM NICOL, ESQ., M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

REPORT.

The Directors, in submitting to the Proprietors the Accounts of the Bank for the Half-year ending the 31st December, 1863, have much satisfaction in reporting that the Net Profit for the Six Months, after deducting all charges, amounts to 84,335*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, which, added to 14,343*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* brought forward from the last Account, results in a total of 98,668*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*

Out of this Sum the Directors recommend that the usual Dividend of 61. per Cent., together with the Bonus of 61. per Cent., be declared for the Half-year, making, with the Dividend paid in August last, 187. per Cent. for the Year. They further propose to carry 10,000*l.* to the Reserve Fund, making that Fund 100,000*l.*, leaving 16,688*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.* to be carried forward to Profit and Loss new Account.

In consequence of the great increase of the Business of the Bank, the Directors consider it advisable further to increase the Capital of the Company, by the issue of 7500 New Shares, to be offered, pro rata, amongst the Proprietors, as they appeared in the Register on the 3rd instant, last date when the Transfer Books of the Company were closed; such Shares to be issued at the price of 40*l*. each, being a premium of 20*l*. per Share. Full particulars of the Issue will be transmitted by Circular to each Proprietor.

This operation will produce 300,000*l.*, out of which 150,000*l.* will be added to the Capital of the Company, and 150,000*l.* (being the Premium on the Shares), will be added to the Reserve Fund, raising the former to 750,000*l.*, and the latter to 250,000*l.*—together One Million.

The Directors regret having to announce the decease of HENRY OVERTON, Esq., for many years one of the Auditors of the Bank. The decease creates a vacancy in the Auditorship, which it is in the power of the Meeting to fill up.

The Directors retiring by rotation are—

PHILIP PATTON BLYTH, Esq.,

EDWARD HUGGINS, Esq.,

and WILLIAM LEE, Esq., M.P.,

all of whom are eligible for re-election, and offer themselves accordingly.

The Dividend will be payable at the Head Office, or at any of the Branches, on and after Monday, the 15th instant.

At the ANNUAL MEETING of the PROPRIETORS, held on THURSDAY, the 4th February, 1864, at the LONDON TAVERN, Bishopsgate-street, the following Report for the Year ending the 31st December, 1863, was read by the Secretary.

WILLIAM NICOL, ESQ., M.P., IN THE CHAIR.

REPORT.

The Directors, in submitting to the Proprietors the Accounts of the Bank for the Half-year ending the 31st December, 1863, have much satisfaction in reporting that the Net Profit for the Six Months, after deducting all charges, amounts to 84,325*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, which, added to 14,343*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* brought forward from the last Account, results in a total of 98,668*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*

Out of this Sum the Directors recommend that the usual Dividend of 6% per Cent., together with the Bonus of 6% per Cent., be declared for the Half-year, making, with the Dividend paid in August last, 18% per Cent. for the Year. They further propose to carry 10,000/- to the Reserve Fund, making that Fund 100,000/-, leaving 16,668/- ss. 10d. to be carried forward to Profit and Loss new Account.

In consequence of the great increase of the Business of the Bank, the Directors consider it advisable further to increase the Capital of the Company, by the issue of 7500 New Shares, to be offered, pro rata, amongst the Proprietors, as they appeared further in the Register on the 3rd instant, the date when the Transfer Books of the Company were closed; such Shares to be issued at the price of 40*l.* each, being a premium of 20*l.* per Share. Full particulars of the Issue will be transmitted by Circular to each Proprietor.

This operation will produce 300,000£., out of which 150,000£. will be added to the Capital of the Company, and 150,000£. (being the Premium on the Shares), will be added to the Reserve Fund, raising the former to 750,000£., and the latter to 250,000£.—together One Million.

The Directors regret having to announce the decease of HENRY OVERTON, Esq., for many years one of the Auditors of the Bank. This creates a vacancy in the Auditorship, which it is in the power of the Meeting to fill up.

The Directors retiring by rotation are—

all of whom are eligible for re-election, and offer themselves accordingly.

The Dividend will be payable at the Head Office, or at any of the Branches, on and after Monday, the 15th instant.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 28, 1864.

LORD WESTBURY seems determined to render his period of office conspicuous, by startling and sensational changes in the law. Most law reformers who have arrived at that age at which experience and acquired wisdom generally make men cautious, apply themselves to cases in which a measure of reform is by common consent admitted to be necessary or advisable, and in which there is some recognised defect to be amended. Not so Lord Westbury. He appears to have entered upon his Chancellorship with a packet of bills for altering the law in his pocket, which he introduces to the Legislature without any previous consultation with those who might be able to offer to him some useful suggestions, and certainly without taking care that the language in which his proposed measures are expressed should be intelligible to ordinary, or even to well-practised, judicial minds. As one proof of the correctness of this remark, we may mention the 194th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, relating to composition deeds, the obscurities of which have puzzled and bewildered every person—judge, counsel, or layman—who has had to deal with it.

The last of his Lordship's experiments in the way of law reform is intitled "An Act for Limitation of Actions and Process for Small Debts, and to amend the Acts relating to the County Courts, and to confer on such Courts a limited Jurisdiction in Equity." In the present article we will discuss the 2nd and 3rd proposed sections of this bill. The preamble recites, "that it is desirable to limit the period within which actions for small debts may be brought, and process issued upon judgments for the same, and to amend the acts relating to the county courts, and to give to such courts a limited jurisdiction in equity." Then the 2nd section runs thus:—

"From and after the 1st day of March, 1865, no action or suit shall be brought in any court to recover any debt or money demand not exceeding 20*l.*, unless within one year after such debt or money demand, or some part thereof, becomes due and payable: provided that such time or period of one year shall not commence or run during such time as the debtor shall be absent from England, but shall commence or continue to run from his return."

We think our readers will agree with us in considering this a surprising section—surprising in the extensive change it proposes to make in the law, and in the crowd of doubts as to its construction which it suggests. In terms, the enactment is limited to debts or money demands, and does not include actions for unliquidated damages (which cannot be comprised in the term "money demand"). This latter class of actions is, therefore, left to the period of limitation prescribed by the present Statute of Limitations, and in this respect the Lord Chancellor's original turn of mind displays itself; for, as to most actions of tort, the 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, enacts, that the period of limitation shall be four years, while that applicable to simple contract debts is six; but Lord Westbury's bill limits the period of suing for small debts to one year, and leaves the time within which actions of tort must be brought to be governed by the statute of James I.

Then comes the provision, "unless within one year after such debt or money demand, or some part thereof, became due and payable." What is the meaning of the words "or some part thereof?" In an able letter in the Times upon this section, written by a metropolitan county court judge, these words are discussed, and a case is put of a debt payable by instalments, running over a period of more than two years—a loan of 50*l.*, payable by quarterly instalments of 5*l.*; as soon as the first instalment is due, it is the case of a debt "part whereof has become due and payable;" so that when the sixth instalment is due, part of the debt has been due and payable more than a year, and the creditor is barred of his legal remedy for the residue. This effect cannot have been intended, and is probably only the result of carelessness, and requires alteration to make it sensible.

In the next place, it is to be observed that the enactment wholly ignores the existing law, which enables a creditor to sue within six years after any written acknowledgment by the debtor, from which a promise to pay the debt can be inferred, and also within six years after a part payment. Why, in the case of debts under 20*l.* these provisions are to be ruthlessly swept away, we do not at present understand; light may be thrown upon the subject by the discussions in Parliament, to which this bill of the Chancellor must give rise.

But we are at a loss to understand why there is such a great reduction in the number of years. In the case of debts under 20*l.*, our present social state being considered, six years may be too long a period, but one year is too short. If the object of the bill is chiefly to protect the poor, who are allowed to run into debt to the extent to which the tradesman thinks they have goods sufficient to satisfy his claim, a much smaller sum than 20*l.* would be sufficient; 5*l.*, or even less, would be large enough. An enactment limiting the period of limitation to one year for debts of this amount might induce the poor to be more thrifty and provident, and less inclined to run up debts, because they would feel that the tradesman must, in self defence, enforce payment. But why should the man who runs up debts varying from 15*l.* to 20*l.* with a number of tradesmen, without the prospect, or perhaps the intention, of paying them, be discharged in a year from all liability? The county court judge, in his able letter, has put several cases which shew the hardship and impolicy of this limitation of the debtor's liability. We trust that the Legislature will amend this proposed enactment, by inserting some middle period between one year and six years, and by extending it to all simple contract debts, preserving at the same time the saving effects of part payment and written acknowledgments, limiting, if they please, Lord Westbury's proposition to debts of a much smaller amount than 20*l.*

The next proposed enactment in Lord Westbury's bill, to which we will at present call attention, runs thus:—"From the 1st March, 1865, no process shall issue, in respect of any judgment or order of any Court, for a sum not exceeding 20*l.*, exclusive of costs, obtained or made in any action or suit to recover any debt or money demand, but within one year, either from the date of such judgment or order, or from the time when the amount payable under such judgment or order, or the last instalment thereof, became due, or within one year from the time of the last payment made by or on behalf of the judgment debtor: provided always, that the time or period of one year shall not commence or run when, or during any such time as, the debtor shall be absent from England, but shall commence, or continue to run, from his return; and such period of one year shall be extended to two years, if it shall be found by the Court that the debtor has at any time within a year next before the date of such judgment or order, or at any time within a year from such date, made any fraudulent gift or alienation of any part of his property, or concealed property with intent to defeat or delay his creditors."

This section also is limited to judgments or orders for debts or money demands, and is, therefore, open to the same objections in this respect which we have ventured to urge against the 1st section; it does give the creditor the benefit of a part payment by the debtor, but not of a written acknowledgment; and where, under the judgment or order, the debt is payable by instalments, it provides that the year shall run from the time when the last instalment is payable. Why there are these differences between this and the previous section, we do not see. The proviso, "that the period shall be extended to two years, if the debtor has within a year before or after the date of the judgment or order made a fraudulent gift, &c., or concealment of his property with intent to delay his creditors," seems to us very useless. The object of the bill is, we believe, to protect small debtors—that class of persons who form the mass of defendants in county courts, and who have no notion of fraudulent alienations or concealments of property to defeat or delay their creditors, simply because they have no property which they can so deal with. A bedstead and a few chairs, and other actually necessary articles of furniture, compose the wordly state of the man who is the victim of the tallyman, and whose case Lord Westbury compassionated in the House of Lords. What does such a man know of fraudulent concealment? As to him, the proviso is surplusage, and as to debtors to a larger amount, we think the period of limitation too short.

As we have already stated, we consider six years too long a period in the present state of society, and that it might usefully be shortened; and probably, out of the discussions to take place upon this bill of Lord Westbury's, a measure may be framed which will be more just and suitable to the interests both of creditor and debtor.

It is high time that some restraint should be put upon the practice which seems to prevail, on the part of Government, of interfering with the sentences passed upon prisoners by the judges, before whom they have been openly tried.

There may, no doubt, be occasionally a miscarriage of justice—extenuating circumstances may, subsequently to the trial, come to light—or even facts which may shew the perfect innocence of a person unjustly convicted.

In these cases the prerogative of mercy may righteously be exercised, but its exercise should, like a trial in open court, be upon facts clearly proved, set forth and published. If, when a man has been tried and found guilty by a jury, and sentence has been passed upon him by the judge, the sentence is set aside or modified by secret representations, or by political influence, it is evident that the administration of justice will be brought into contempt; that the criminal classes will, with less hesitation, commit offences, when they feel, that, even if convicted, they may find out a way to escape, if not with impunity, at any rate, with an amount of punishment, bearing some semblance to it.

These remarks are, we think, called for by a debate on a motion made in the House of Lords for the production of any memorial received by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or the Irish Government, praying for the release of three prisoners, confined in gaol for agrarian outrages. It was alleged by the noble Lord who made the motion, that it was owing to the capricious interference of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, that agrarian offences were so numerous in Ireland, for, by his meddling with the sentences passed upon prisoners, by shortening the term of imprisonment, the people had ceased to respect the law.

Another noble Lord said it was rumoured (and if such things are done secretly, it is no wonder that there are such rumours) that the person who brought the case before the Lord Lieutenant, was "one of the members of the county, and his constituents being anxious to have the men released, brought, through him, a pressure of political influence on the Lord Lieutenant."

These accusations are of the gravest character, they ought not to be lightly made, or to be lightly met. If they are capable of an answer, the answer should be full and effectual; if it fails to be so, the Lord Lieutenant will lie under an imputation deserving the severest reprobation.

The mode in which the motion was met by Lord Granville, on the part of the Government, is by no means satisfactory; he agreed to produce the memorial, and any letters of a public nature which accompanied it, but not any communications between the judges and the Government, or any confidential communications.

Such a production of documents is wholly useless in trying the question raised in the House of Lords. For of course all documents addressed to the Lord Lieutenant with the object of bringing political influence to bear upon him would be private and confidential. And if not so marked would be so considered.

But ought private and confidential letters to be received, or at any rate relied upon, for the purpose of determining whether the sentence of a prisoner should be lessened or remitted?

If a private communication affects persons engaged in the trial of the prisoners, they, at any rate, ought to be made fully acquainted with its contents, so that they might have an opportunity of shewing whether it be false, either wholly or partially, and also of meeting openly any imputations which it may throw upon their conduct or characters.

If a private communication seeks for a remission of punishment, on the ground that such lenity would increase the political influence of a particular party, it is clear that such a communication ought never to be received; or, if received, should only be answered by a severe rebuke to the person who made it.

Our own impression is, that much evil is done by the mode in which, not only in Ireland, but also in England, the sentences of judges upon prisoners is meddled with by the Government.

We believe that only in rare cases should judicial sentences be altered; and that in all cases, whatever communications are made to Government on the subject, should be filed as of record; and that a minute, also properly recorded, should state upon what evidence, and for what reasons, every judicial sentence is in any respect altered.

It would be still better if no sentence could be in any way altered, save by a properly constituted court, which would exercise jurisdiction upon purely judicial grounds, far above local feelings or political influence.

Correspondence.

THE LAND TRANSFER ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

THE editor of the Times newspaper having published a letter signed "A now Happy Landowner," containing statements in reference to this subject, which, in the opinion of several members of the legal profession, as well as myself, were quite incredible, I attempted to get some proof of them adduced, but have failed in doing so.

My suggestion to "A now Happy Landowner" to produce his bill of costs was met by the absurd proposition of printing it in the Times at my expense. My two last letters to the editor of the Times have met with no acknowledgment whatever.

I beg the favour, therefore, of your inserting the correspondence in your paper, in order that the public may judge whether the statements of "A now Happy Landowner," to which the Times has given currency, deserve credit or not.

I inclose my card, and am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

A. M.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TIMES."

SIR,—As an instance of the practical working of the Lord Chancellor's registration of title scheme, let me state my own experience. Wanting money, and having a valuable landed estate with a complicated title, I mortgaged it for 3500*l.* The law costs exceeded 500*l.* I made a second mortgage, and had to incur again frightful costs. I determined to register my title, subject to the mortgages, and obtained a certificate of an indefeasible title, at a total cost of 50*l.*

With this certificate in my hand, and wishing to consolidate my mortgages, I borrowed 4000*l.* The legal expenses of the last mortgage do not exceed 5*l.*

Thus, in my very first transaction with a registered estate, I save more than ten times the amount of my expenses in obtaining a registered title.

I feel bound, therefore, in gratitude to Lord Westbury, to acknowledge publicly what he has done for me, and what he equally offers to other landowners.

Yours faithfully,

A NOW HAPPY LANDOWNER.

SIR,—If it be really true that your correspondent who signs himself "A now Happy Landowner," paid 500*l.* for the costs of a mortgage of his estate for 3500*l.*, it is obvious that the explanation of his having afterwards obtained a certificate of an indefeasible title at a total cost of 50*l.* lies in the fact that he had previously spent 500*l.*, or at least a very large sum, in clearing his title.

If he had gone to the Land Registry Office before he made his mortgage, would he have registered his title for 50*l.*?

I do not wish to question the utility of the Land Transfer Act. I believe it to be the germ of a new system which will be most beneficial to landowners; but it is well to know the truth, and I would suggest to your correspondent, that he should give his own name, and that of his solicitor, and that he should offer to produce the bill of costs for 500*l.*

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

Lincoln's-inn, May 11.

A. M.

SIR,—I do not think "A. M." should doubt my word; but although such a document would be very uninteresting to your readers, and would occupy several columns of your paper, yet if he will pay for its insertion, I will furnish the bill of costs alluded to, which he thinks should be produced, and which even now makes my head ache to think of having paid.

Practical experience has taught me, that although a heavy bill of costs may have been incurred on purchasing or mortgaging an estate, in what is called "making out and clearing up the title," yet such expense has again to be met on every similar transaction with the same property.

The fees of the Land Registry Office itself I found very small, and am satisfied that a title not circumstanced as mine was may be passed at half what it cost me.

In any future dealing with my land, look at the immense advantages of a registered title. A purchaser will not only be safe, but free from lawyers' bills. And if I want to raise money thereon, I shall not have to wait, as I had before, twelve months for the loan, while the mortgagees' solicitor was satisfying himself upon the title, but can obtain it at a few days' notice.

To quote the simile used by Lord Westbury, in his celebrated speech, "I have thrown off the old man of the sea, otherwise, the family solicitor."

In conclusion, I strongly advise every landowner to do as I have done—so far be his own lawyer as to take his deeds himself to the Land Registry Office, where he will find every possible attention and courtesy cheerfully given.

Yours faithfully,

A NOW HAPPY LANDOWNER.

SIR,—I do not wish to throw doubt upon the word of your correspondent, "A now Happy Landowner," in a way that would imply any wilful misrepresentation on his part, but I doubt whether the statements in his letter, published in your impression of the 11th instant, or the inferences deduced from them, would be borne out on an examination of the facts.

As your correspondent has no objection to give publicity to the bill of costs, I beg him to furnish me with a copy of it, the expense of which I will pay.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
Lincoln's-inn, May 14. A. M.

9, New-square, Lincoln's-inn,
18th May, 1864.

Mr. A. M. presents his compliments to the editor of the Times, and begs to inquire whether his letter of the 14th instant, in which he requested the correspondent, writing under the signature of "A now Happy Landowner," to furnish a copy of his bill of costs, has been communicated to that gentleman.

It is the opinion of Mr. M., and of many professional gentlemen who have read the correspondence, that the statements made by "A now Happy Landowner," are incorrect, and calculated to mislead the public. Mr. M. feels confident that the editor of the Times will wish that any statements published in that paper should, when fairly challenged, be either proved to be correct or be retracted.

Review.

Russell on the Power and Duty of an Arbitrator, and the Law of Submissions and Awards. Third Edition.
[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes; H. Sweet.]

THE fact that a book, the cost of which is not small, has in a few years reached a third edition, is a tolerably conclusive proof that it has met with the approbation of the Profession; indeed, we may say, without fear of contradiction, that few modern law books have been received with so much praise, and so little censure, as Mr. Russell's work on Arbitration. The practice of referring cases both at and before trial has been for several years gradually increasing, and has been fostered and promoted by statute, and until Mr. Russell's work was published, there was no work which satisfied all the requirements of those who wished to acquaint themselves with the whole subject of arbitration. The work of the late Baron Watson on the same subject had deservedly gained a high character, but it does not contain the same amount of information as Mr. Russell's book does, and cannot be considered as a book of practice on the subject. Mr. Russell states "that the principal object of his treatise is to assist an arbitrator in ascertaining what are his particular powers and relative duties, and how he may best exercise the one, and perform the other;" and accordingly he enters very fully into this branch of the law of arbitration, and gives clear directions to arbitrators what they should do; and what they should avoid doing, in the course of a reference.

The work is too bulky to allow of a minute review. Mr. Russell tells us in his Preface that no pains have been spared to render it useful, and he is fully justified in so telling us. It must have cost him great labour to compile and arrange so comprehensive a book, and to discuss so fully as he has done the various branches of the subject. We can have no doubt that this third edition will confirm and enhance the reputation which the work has already acquired.

It is not within the province of this work to treat of the main objection to arbitration, namely, the delay which so often occurs in the course of the reference, in consequence of the counsel who are attending before the arbitrator, or the arbitrator himself, being prevented from keeping appointments made, or from making them, by a press of other business. We made some observations on this matter in our number of the 9th April (ante, p. 124), and ventured to suggest the expediency of a court of arbitrators, among whom causes referred would be allotted, and before whom counsel must attend, as they must at Nisi Prius or in Banc, when their case is called on. This is a plan which we have frequently heard mooted, and which deserves consideration. The amount of business referred is now so very large, and delay is so often a serious evil to the parties, that any plan which secures expedition deserves to be well considered.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday, May 23.

Lord Brougham, on the motion for the second reading of the County Courts Acts Amendment Bill, said he found that sixty county court judges were against that part of the bill which proposed to interfere with the right of imprisonment. He found that there were 900,000 suits in the course of the year instituted in the county courts; out of these there were not above 9000 judgment summonses, or in the proportion of 1 per cent.; and of the 9000 judgment summonses, which were not committals, but only involved the possibility to commit for debt, a very small proportion were committals. This was a smaller proportion than in the superior courts of the Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and the Exchequer, in which there were 8 in 100. There were some parts of the bill of which he approved, and especially that which gave an equitable jurisdiction. Another part of the bill proposed to shorten the period of limitation for the recovery of debts to one year. Now, while he thought the present period too long, he looked upon one year as too short, and would recommend the period for the recovery of debts to be fixed at two years. At present, the summonses of the county courts were issued as a matter of course, and there ought to be some check to this power. Upon the whole, he approved of the principle of the bill.

Lord St. Leonards regretted that he could not support the bill as it at present stood. He objected to the reduction of the time within which an action could be brought for the recovery of a simple contract debt to one year. As the law now stood, if a debtor acknowledged a debt to be due, or paid part of his debt, he was liable to be sued for six years after the date of this acknowledgment; but if the bill of his noble and learned friend passed, in no court could there be a recovery of a simple contract debt beyond one year. At present, the labourer could go to the grocer or baker with whom he was in the habit of dealing, and could get goods on credit, for the small shopkeeper found, that if he did not trust him in winter, he could not gain his custom in summer; and the small shopkeeper depended on the labourer. With this bill, the credit of the working man would be destroyed. Again: the sympathies of their Lordships ought not to be solely with the debtor; the creditor was also entitled to his share. The small shopkeeper, with a small capital, ought to have the power of enforcing his demands. The amount of debts represented by the 900,000 plaints which were issued out of these courts represented a large sum of money. There ought not to be repeated committals for the same debt. The judge ascertained whether the debtor could pay by instalments, and made an order requiring him to pay the instalments under the penalty of commitment, and there was no reason why this power was not to be continued. There was one portion of this bill which, when it became known, would certainly excite general opposition, and that was, that the judge should have power to make an order, that the employer of a debtor should be directed to appropriate certain instalments of the debtor's earnings, and to pay them to the high bailiff in liquidation of the debt. Suppose that there were a million of suits throughout England, and that, in a large proportion of them, orders of this kind were made upon employers. At a public meeting, a manufacturer had recently stated, that he employed 2500 persons; and such a person would be so constantly served with orders to appropriate portions of his workmen's wages, that it would be almost impossible for him to carry on his business. But if this clause were struck out, and the remainder of it passed, there would be no means of compelling a labouring man to pay his debts. He thought that it would be most objectionable to transfer to the county courts the powers of the courts of equity, and indeed, that a greater curse could not be inflicted upon the country. When a man possessed of small property died, the course was now for the parties interested to come to some arrangement, and dispose of their claims amicably; but if this bill passed, each such case would give rise to an equitable suit in the county court, and the whole country would soon be overrun with litigation. Beyond this, power of appeal was given from these new equity courts to the original court of equity. For the reasons which he had stated, he thought that there were many objections to the measure which was then before their Lordships.

Lord Chelmsford observed, that his noble and learned friend must forgive him for saying, that in the able speech with which he introduced the bill he only permitted their Lordships to see one side of the case. He could not help admiring the address with which his noble and learned friend had described the misery to which an unhappy debtor was exposed to under the system of imprisonment for debt. It was absolutely necessary, however, that their Lordships should have pointed out to them the difference between commitment by the county court judges and the old law of imprisonment for debt. The two things were totally distinct. Imprisonment for debt was the act of the creditor for the satisfaction of his debt. The power of commitment was an act of the judge for the disobedience of his orders. Imprisonment for debt took place whether the debtor had the means of paying or not. The power of commitment was only exercised when the debtor had the ability, but refused to pay. The power of imprisonment was for an indefinite period, but the power of commitment was for a limited time. His noble and learned friend had stated the number of commitments for two years, ending December, 1863, as being no less than 17,797, and had calculated that the sums spent by those persons in prison amounted to 253,854*l*. His noble and learned friend had assumed that on the average those persons earned 3*s*. a day, and that if the number imprisoned was multiplied by three it would give a sum of 43,434*l*. as the value of the labour lost to the country, in order to obtain payment of 92,488*l*. But the fallacy was in assuming that those prisoners were persons of the working class at full work, at 3*s*. a day. From all he could learn, a man in full work was seldom sent to prison. The debtor class was almost as easily distinguished as the criminal class, and this power of commitment generally fell, not on the honest hardworking man, but on the profligate and idle—on the man who worked only three days a week, and was a drunkard for the remainder. It had been stated, that in one year 900,000 plaints had been issued, representing a sum of upwards of 2,000,000*l*., and it appeared that of those more than a half had been settled before judgment. There had been about 400,000 judgments issued, representing nearly 1,000,000*l*., and one-third of the judgments had been settled without a commitment. With regard to the small proportion of commitments to the number of plaints brought into court, the opinion of one of the judges was, that the proportion of defendants actually imprisoned in proportion to those sued was not more than 1.25 per cent. His noble and learned friend had referred to the number of times persons had been recommitted for the same cause, and he had spoken of a case in which a person had been committed fifty times. He wished to ask his noble and learned friend whether he knew of any instance of a person having been committed, not fifty, but five times, for the same cause? It appeared from a statement of one of the judges, that out of 316 cases, only three had been committed a second time; and another judge stated, that out of 4425 commitments only 300 were for a second time. He did not think the noble and learned Lord had done justice to the county court judges. The answers of those learned persons were not strained in accordance with the powers given to them with respect to imprisonment. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) said, that the object of this bill was to prevent the present mischievous and dangerous facility to contract debt given to the labouring classes. He (Lord Chelmsford) certainly thought the two illustrations given by his noble and learned friend of his position most inapplicable; for surely no county court judge would commit a father for a debt contracted by a daughter without his authority. No county court judge would commit a husband for a debt contracted by a wife for useless finery. It was proposed by the bill to reduce the limitation of time within which actions under 20*l*. could be brought. Now, he confessed he could not see the necessity for drawing a distinction as to sums, although he admitted that the general term might be curtailed. Large and small were but relative terms, and what was a small debt to one man would be a large one to another. He could see no reason why the proposed distinction should be made. This short limitation of time would be very mischievous in many cases. Take the case of the medical man, who commonly sent in his accounts only once in twelve months. And there were many other similar cases. His noble and learned friend proposed to take away the concurrent jurisdiction of the superior courts for debts under 20*l*. No doubt, it was desirable to limit the costs of actions under 20*l*., but there were many manufacturers and small tradesmen who hitherto had been enabled to sue out a writ in a superior court, and generally the issue of that writ was sufficient to obtain the debt. This clause, however, would deprive them of that remedy. The effect of this measure would, indeed, be to stop credit altogether in this branch of business, because it would be impossible for the small manufacturers to give their usual credit if this bill were in operation. He would suggest to his noble and learned friend to withdraw all those clauses which related to imprisonment under the jurisdiction of the county courts.

Lord Lyveden said, the bill would be of incalculable benefit to the poorer classes of the community, and, indeed, to society at large.

Lord Cranworth said, the existence of the county courts, as at present constituted, had created a vicious system of credit amongst the poorer classes. The proposed change would lead to a wholesome state of things. Indeed, he would like to see all small debts placed upon the same footing as debts of honour. He should certainly support the second reading of this bill.

The Lord Chancellor expressed his regret that the discussion of so important a measure as this should have secured so small an attendance of their Lordships as he then saw present [there were eight peers present.] The opponents of this bill seemed to take three things for granted. The first was, that it was good and expedient that there should be for the poor man the same facility of credit which he now obtained. Now, that credit was a constant temptation to the labourer to live beyond his means. The second proposition that was assumed was, that the creditor had a moral right to imprison his debtor, but he (the Lord Chancellor) denied that in toto. The third assumption, which he denied, was that the poor debtor ought to be placed upon a different footing from the man who owed 500*l*. or a 1000*l*. Under the existing law the future property of the rich man was not held liable for the payment of his debts, but the future earnings of the poor man were subject to that liability. It might be a fair question whether the limitation for the recovery of debts should be for one year or for two years; but that and all other details of the measure could be best considered by their Lordships in committee.

The Earl of Derby said that the noble and learned Lord treated the present law as one which encouraged the granting of reckless credit. But imprisonment was inflicted in those cases only in which the debtor could pay his debt, and in which it could not, therefore, be considered that the credit had been improperly given. The imprisonment had naturally the effect of inducing people to meet their liabilities, and he saw no reason why that arrangement should not be continued. The noble and learned Lord would take away the only means of compelling the debtor to meet his just engagements when it was in his power to do so. One of the clauses of the bill would enable the creditor to attach the wages of the debtor, but the probable consequence of such a provision would be, that in many cases the employer would refuse to incur the trouble which such an arrangement would impose upon him, and would dismiss the debtor from his service.

Lord Wensleydale said he could not think it would be desirable to abolish imprisonment in the case of a man who had the means of paying his debts, and refused to fulfil that duty.

The bill was then read a second time.

The Under-secretaries' Indemnity Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Common-law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1853) Amendment Bill was also read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, May 19.

Sir G. Grey, in reply to Sir L. Palk, said that the Church Building Acts Bill would not be brought forward before the 26th inst.

The remaining clauses of the Unions Assessment Committee Amendment Bill were agreed to.

The House went into committee on the Railway Companies Powers Bill, pro forma.

The House also went into committee on the Railways Construction Facilities Bill, pro forma.

The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Admiralty Lands and Works Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Limited Penalties Bill was read a second time.

Mr. Dodson moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the registration of county voters.

The motion was agreed to.

Sir G. Grey brought in a bill to amend the Act for the better Management of the Highways in England, which was read a first time.

Friday, May 20.

Mr. Brand moved for the issue of a new writ for Gloucester, in the room of Mr. J. J. Powell, who, since his election, has accepted the recordership of Wolverhampton.

Monday, May 23.

In reply to Mr. A. Mills,

The Attorney-General said—The bill relating to the New Law Courts was not abandoned for this session, but it was not in his power to fix the day upon which he would submit the matter to the House.

The Attorney-General for Ireland, on the request of Mr. Whiteside, postponed the second reading of the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill.

The Limited Penalties Bill passed through committee.

The Chief Rents (Ireland) Bill, after certain resolutions relative to stamps were agreed to, and embodied therein, passed through committee.

On the motion of Sir John Hay, leave was given to bring in a bill to authorise the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to issue their notes in Scotland, and to make them legal tender there.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in committee of the whole House, moved the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to enable certain banking copartnerships, which shall discontinue the issue of their own bank-notes, to sue and be sued by their public officer." The right hon. gentleman stated that the National and Provincial Bank were prepared to surrender their issue of notes, and to remove their banking-house to London. They were advised that if they did so they might lose the privilege of suing and being sued by their public officer. Now, this was clearly not the object o the act of 1844, and it was contrary to public policy. The aim of the present bill was to remedy that technical defect. The resolution was then agreed to.

REPORTS AND PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

THE Twenty-ninth Report of the Inspectors appointed under the provisions of the act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 38, to visit the prisons of Great Britain, presented to both Houses of Parliament, by command of her Majesty, has just been printed, viz. No. 1, Southern District; No. 2, Northern District. They contain much interesting matter.

In Report, No. 1, it is stated, that while the Report was in press, a question had arisen in one of the prisons, as to whether prisoners under sentence of penal servitude can be legally required to perform hard labour during their stay in the prison. "As this is not the first time by many," says the inspector, "that the same difficulty has been raised by that class of prisoners, it may be useful to state, for the information of those who may be in doubt on the subject, that the stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 84, s. 18, provides that they may be so employed, if one or more of the visiting justices shall give a written order to that effect" (P. 18).

The following incident, the inspector says, deserves to be recorded, as a caution against forming the floors of refractory cells of stone or brick, which can be readily raised:—"Thomas S., being under punishment in a refractory cell, barricaded himself, by taking up the pavement and putting it against the door. In this position it was, of course, impossible to get him out; and as he had refused all food or water from Friday night till Sunday afternoon, it was necessary to employ some means for his removal, lest he should be starved to death.

"In the afternoon of Sunday he asked for some water, and having put his hand out of the trap to take it, his arm was seized by the warders outside, and he was forcibly drawn through the trap-door, which measures only one foot by fourteen inches. As the prisoner was a well-grown man, the account of his extrication would have appeared incredible, but for the concurrent testimony of all concerned. To avoid such an occurrence for the future, the floors of the refractory cells have been taken up, and replaced by three-inch planks, which it will be impossible to remove." (Id., p. 33).

Again: "The Glamorgan Discharged Prisoners Aid Society, which has been referred to in a former Report, appears to be producing good results, by assisting deserving prisoners to get into employment; and there is no reason to think that the apprehensions expressed by some gentlemen, that it was likely to tend to the increase of crime, by permanently establishing a dangerous class in the county (Glamorgan), will be verified. The society is very economically worked, and I learned from Mr. Fowler, who, besides being the founder of the society, has watched its operations with great care, that he is satisfied beyond all doubt, that it has done much good, and is not aware that it has done any harm. With reference to the objections alluded to above, that the society has a tendency to fix a criminal population in the neighbourhood, which would otherwise disperse itself more widely, Mr. Fowler remarks, 'The itinerant rogue rarely accepts our assistance, which is almost entirely limited to persons more or less connected with South Wales, and for the most part with Glamorganshire.' (Id., p. 33).

The inspector, with reference to the Clerkenwell County House of Detention, regrets the "great amount of juvenile crime still existing on the Middlesex side of the Thames (exclusively of the city of London), notwithstanding the benevolent endeavours made of late years to repress it by reformatories and industrial schools." (Id., p. 47). He says, "that 148 boys in 1862, and 101 in 1863, have been in that prison, many several times." He adds—"The county of Middlesex possesses an industrial school at Feltham, which was established under stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 169, and numbers at present 568 inmates; but although this school resembles in its objects, and in many of its features, the reformatory schools certified under stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86, it is characterised by two essential peculiarities, namely, that the ages of the inmates on their reception are required to be above seven, and under fourteen, years; and that the boys are received directly from the courts, and therefore do not undergo the preliminary imprisonment required by the act last cited." (Id., p. 48).

Roman Catholic priests have manifested of late years a very natural wish to attend to the spiritual interests of those of their community confined in gaols. In reporting respecting the prisons in Surrey, the inspector says, that he "felt it to be his duty, some months since, to call the attention of the Secretary of State to a rule of the prison which required the governor to supply the Roman Catholic prisoners with the Protestant version of the Bible, even though such prisoners might be attended by ministers of their own religion, and supplied by them with Douai Bibles. The rule, however, has been now so far modified as not to require that Protestant Bibles should be furnished to Roman Catholic prisoners, except at their own request."

It seems that the Prison Ministers Act, 1863, has not been acted upon to its full extent, but the visiting justices have awarded a Roman Catholic priest 60*l.* a year for attending Roman Catholic prisoners at the House of Correction. The inspector complains that "collective worship by Roman Catholic prisoners is impossible under the present circumstances, as there is no large room which could be set aside for the celebration of mass, and it has not been formally proposed to lend the chapel for that purpose." (Id., p. 78).

If a separate chapel is to be built for the accommodation of the Roman Catholic prisoners, it seems difficult to see why Protestant Dissenters may not set up a similar claim.

In the Report, No. 2, Northern District, the inspector says, that "it has been attempted in Edinburgh to check 'the social evil' by imprisonment, and a large number of females have been committed for 'importuning.' If such a hopeless experiment is to be continued, suitable accommodation, at least, should be provided, and care should be taken that the inmates are not exposed to the evil influences inseparable from associations in a prison." (Id., p. 86).

With reference to the exercise of their jurisdiction by the magisterial authorities at Edinburgh, we should like to be informed whether their practice of committing for importuning is confined, as we may infer from the Report, to "females;" if it is so, their conduct is unjust, as well as injudicious.

Importunity, they must be well aware, is not confined to the female sex, and if it be a proper subject for punishment, males as well as females, who may be guilty of the offence, should be equally and impartially punished for it.

A return has just been made to an order of the House of Lords, dated the 3rd May, 1864, containing a copy of the Report of Sir R. Bromley on the Greenwich Hospital, with the papers connected therewith.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

A MEETING of the department of jurisprudence and amendment of the law was held on Monday, at 3, Waterloo-place, to consider Mr. Hastings's paper, proposing a new court of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Lord Brougham occupied the chair. A letter was read from Mr. George Hadfield, M. P., calling attention to a bill now before a select committee of the House of Commons, on the subject of the law of judgments, and inviting the assistance of the Society to give evidence before the committee. The County Courts Amendment Bill was referred to the standing committee to report upon it to the next meeting.

The discussion on Mr. Hastings's paper was resumed, Mr. Hastings giving a brief summary as to its effect, namely, that in a short time there would be neither competent judges nor a bar to conduct the business of the Ecclesiastical Courts. He proposed the establishment of her Majesty's Court of Arches to include the Probate and Divorce Courts, the Admiralty Court, the Court of Arches, Consistorial Courts, &c.

Mr. Stewart wished to call attention to the position in which the clergy would stand on such a change. He thought it would be desirable to make them friendly. The ecclesiastical element should to some extent enter into the new organisation. One thing ought to be provided for in matters of doctrine, that the court should be assisted by the two archbishops.

Sir Eardley Wilmot concurred in the views put forward by Mr. Stewart, and thought the ecclesiastical element ought to be considered and included. He thought the creation of the new court would relieve the present judges from labours with which they were now inconvenienced, but he objected to the abolition of the local courts as courts of the first instance.

Mr. Allen said—On fiscal grounds, too, he thought the appointment of two new judges was rather an expensive process, but he admitted that some relief should be afforded to the judge of the Probate and Divorce Court.

Mr. Lefevre was of opinion that the small country courts should be concentrated. He also objected to the interference of the clergy in legal matters, and would not permit, if he could help it, the presence of the bishops in the Privy Council.

Mr. T. Chambers said ecclesiastical courts only existed in England on account of Church and State. A charge of indecency ought to be tried by a jury, and in questions of doctrine he would exclude the clergy, and leave it to the lawyers to decide, for it was for the laity to decide what was sound doctrine. He would rather trust for true doctrine to lawyers than to clergymen, who were themselves always running into error, and the construction of doctrine was as much the work of a lawyer as the construction of an act of Parliament. If they were to have Ecclesiastical Courts at all, he did not think they could have a better scheme than that submitted by Mr. Hastings.

In reply to a question from Mr. Lefevre,

The Chairman stated that all members of the Privy Council had a right to attend the sittings and hear any cases that came before it.

Mr. Webster looked upon the abolition of the primary jurisdiction of the bishops as a revolutionary act, and that was the real question raised by Mr. Hastings's paper. They must regard the feelings of the Church, which consisted both of laity and clergy, and if Parliament were to make any measure agreeable to the Church it must introduce the ecclesiastical element into the courts entertaining the first proceedings. To place questions of doctrine in the hands of the laity would lead almost to the great question of the severance of Church and State. He believed that it would create such an amount of discontent amongst the clergy in the present relation to the State, that a large portion of them would be disposed to support the principles of the Dissenters, and secede from the State altogether. That was really a question of very grave importance. It appeared to him the greatest security for religious liberty was the union of Church and State. There was a disposition in all sacerdotal bodies, whether Asiatic or European, to set themselves up against all temporal authority, and unless they kept them by law in connexion with the temporal authority they were really raising up a sort of imperium in imperio, which tended directly to weaken the general conditions of the State. He thought it would not be satisfactory to the religious people of the country if the ecclesiastical element were entirely set aside in courts of the first instance. When questions of pure religious doctrine arose, it would be well to have a bishop or a distinguished ecclesiastic sit, if not as a judge, as an assessor in the first instance.

After some further conversation, Mr. Hastings replied, and his paper was referred to the standing committee of the Society.

The meeting then adjourned.

Legal Education.

OXFORD, May 24.—In a congregation held this day, a new Vinerian Statute was promulgated.

Professor Bernard suggested, that if any objections were felt to the proposed Vinerian Statute, they should be expressed, in order that those who had framed the statute might answer them.

Mr. Neale, of Oriel, thought that the statute had too wide a scope. The time must soon come when the whole of the arrangements with respect to the law studies would have to be revised. Till that time came, he thought it would have been best to confine attention to the scholarships. It was proposed to establish two scholarships of 80*l.* each, to last two years. He would have preferred two scholarships each year, of the value of 60*l.*, to last four years. Still he regarded the proposed statute as a useful measure.

Mr. Pottinger, of Worcester, opposed the statute. He thought it did not meet the real want of the time, which was for tutorial instruction in the subjects taken in by students in the law and modern history school. Lectures were wanted twice a day, rather than twice a week.

Mr. Freeman, of Trinity, as an examiner in the law and modern history school, gave thanks for a small modicum of relief.

Professor Bernard remarked, that the statute had only one opponent. He differed from him in regarding professional instruction in the law as more important at the present time than the tutorial. Scientific teaching of the law was the great want of the day. The statute must not be considered as final, but as provisional. He would be very glad if such scholarships as Mr. Neale suggested could be established, but the whole Vinerian fund was only 540*l.* a year, and Mr. Neale's suggestion would absorb on the scholarships 480*l.* He thought it more important to provide a teacher than to apply the fund in the way suggested. Mr. Viner's will shewed that his chief wish was to provide a teacher.

Professor Connington objected to the appointment of the teacher by convocation. If it required an act of Parliament to alter the appointment, such an act should be applied for.

In a future convocation, the name of Mr. Montague Bernard, B. C. L., of All Souls' College, who has been nominated to the office of examiner in civil law, was to be submitted to the house.

STARKIE'S LAW OF EVIDENCE.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE ON THE LAW OF EVIDENCE. By THOMAS STARKIE, Esq. Fourth Edition, with very considerable alterations and additions; incorporating the Statutes and reported Cases to the time of publication. By G. M. DOWDESWELL and J. G. MALCOLM, Esqrs., Barristers at Law. In 1 vol. royal 8vo., 1853, price 1*l.* 16*s.* cloth.

In the parliamentary debate on disqualified witnesses (House of Commons, Feb. 12, 1861), referring to the case of Maden v. Catnach, Sir G. C. Lewis said, "He would read from Starkie on Evidence, which was known to be a standard work upon the subject, a statement of the law as applicable to the case (vide Examination as to Religious Belief, pp. 115, 116). That is a clear statement of the rule of law upon the subject."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 4, 1864.

THE consolidation of the copyright laws is, no doubt, a very desirable object; but, considering the recent legislation on part of the subject, sufficient time has been scarcely as yet allowed to ascertain the true principles on which consolidation should be suffered to proceed, particularly as regards registration. A bill has, however, been introduced into Parliament, with the high sounding title of "A Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to Copyright in Works of Literature and the Fine Arts;" and this first attempt to combine and harmonise the numerous existing statutes in the wide field of literary and artistic copyright has certainly been packed into a very small compass. Nevertheless, when we call to mind certain abortive bills of 1857 and 1861, and contrast the promise of this bill with its performance, and investigate its history, its chances of success in a lethargic and moribund Parliament appear so slight, that it would hardly be worth while to discuss its provisions in these pages, were it not for the fact, that the measure has been referred to a select committee, which has already commenced its labours; and it may, therefore, be useful to publish our impressions of this draft bill. Its framers seem better versed in the law of literary than in that of artistic copyright, and have created some confusion by subordinating the latter to the former in various parts of the machinery of the act. But the blots in the law of literary copyright seem for the most part to have been fairly hit, and our remarks will be chiefly directed to the measure as far as it relates to artistic copyright. Our first complaint against the bill in this respect is, that it is not so comprehensive in its scope as it ought to be. According to its interpretation clause, "Works of art shall include articles of sculpture, models, paintings, engravings, drawings, prints, and photographs, or any means by which the representation of objects may be given." Bronzes, workings in ivory, and the precious metals, would hardly come within the definition, and yet, considering the number of these articles "de luxe" in the market, and the immense sums annually expended in their production by skilled artists and designers, it would be difficult to justify their omission. It seems, moreover, to have been forgotten, that the registration of sculptures, models, and casts has been already provided for under the Registration of Designs Acts; and these latter acts are not mentioned in this bill, or its schedule. Perhaps this inadvertence is intentional. Literary works have been hitherto registered at Stationers Hall, whilst designs, sculptures, and models have been registered at Whitehall; but in 1862 the registration of paintings, drawings, and photographs was, in spite of considerable opposition, and certainly with strange incongruity, directed to take place at Stationers Hall, and it is now indirectly sought by this bill to carry the registration of sculptures, models, and casts thither also. We trust that the committee, after hearing evidence as to the efficiency and economy of these two systems of registration will decide against Stationers Hall. The next great defect in this bill is, that the rights of employers of artists are not properly or not adequately recognised. The 8th section does, indeed, provide, that "when any sculpture, model, or cast, or any painting or drawing, or the negative of any photograph" (primary positives are ignored throughout the bill), "shall be sold or disposed of, or shall be made or executed for or on behalf of any other person for a good or valuable consideration, the author or artist thereof shall not produce copies, or engravings or photographs of the same, unless he have leave to do so, by an agreement in writing, signed by the proprietor of such work of art." But this section, while it does not touch replicas (as repetitions of pictures or works of art are called, and which, in artistic language and circles are not copies, as Miss Burdett Coutts and others have found to their cost), nor extend to copies or engravings made before the sale, does not accord any copyright to the purchasers or employers; but that is left in abeyance. The registration should be managed so as to provide for the case of the publication of engravings from a picture yet unsold, and all the existing rights (including copyright and the right of producing replicas) of the producer should pass by the sale of the work of art, unless expressly reserved in writing. The statute of 1862, by its awkwardly worded 1st section seems to intend that in every case of a sale of, or the execution of an order for, any work of art, some writing shall be required to pass the copyright; but it is surely simpler to make such a case an exception to the general rule, and at the same time to preserve the rights of the public, by requiring from the purchaser or employer registration of proprietorship, in order to perfect his copyright.

While we are on this point we may remark, that the next question of the necessity of attestation to licenses or assignments should not again be left open. Of course, also, the definitions of "assigns" and "authors" will need to be amended; and we are not satisfied that "dramatic piece" comprises the various mixed entertainments given at our music and other public halls and galleries. The "concurrence and request" required by sect. 20, for the registration of an assignment, seems altogether a vexatious and useless form; the production of the assignment with the assignor's name to it ought to be sufficient, as in other assignments; for if his name may be forged to the one, so it may be to the other. The 22nd section is extremely vague; and at any rate it would be for the interest of the registrar to learn how many sums of 20l. he is to forfeit in the day or the hour. The 28th section is open to the same objection; the nature of the authorisation is not sufficiently specified, and the provision for costs, as between attorney and client, must have been inserted in forgetfulness of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, s. 6. And in the 33rd section it seems to have been thought impossible for the party summoned to be in the right; or, at any rate, if he should be so, there is no provision for giving him the costs of his successful opposition; and he may, therefore, be annoyed in this way over and over again, with perfect impunity to his assailant.

Again: in the limitation of actions clause (the 38th), the period of limitation ought to commence with the discovery, and not the commission, of the offence. In our opinion this ought to be the rule in every case of tort or wrong-doing; but where the field of operation of an act is so extensive, and the offence may so easily be concealed, and the time of limitation is so short, the proposed emendation can scarcely be seriously resisted. By the 29th and 30th sections, notice of copyright in any book first printed and published in the British dominions, or in any foreign country to which the privilege of copyright is extended, and of any work of art registered under the act, MAY be given to the Commissioners of Customs, who shall then publish lists of the proprietors of these copyrights at the home custom-houses, and in such foreign ports and places as the Board of Trade may determine. Pirated copies of works inserted in these lists are prohibited under a penalty, and custom-house officers are authorised to detain any package suspected to contain such pirated copies. The lists are to be revised every seven years, and annual notices as to their contents have to be sent by the proprietors to the commissioners. Why all these provisions should have been inserted except in ease of the custom-house authorities, or rather of piracy, it is not easy to conjecture. By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 160, similar notices of copyright were compulsory, not permissive; and as under both statutes the prohibition and detention would extend only to the contents of the lists, the result would be, that where notice had not been given, reprints or fraudulent copies might be imported without any hindrance.

If foreign piracy is really sought to be prevented by means of custom-house restrictions, notice of copyright to the Commissioners of Customs must continue to be compulsory. Under the mention of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 160, another literary grievance crops up, for which no redress is afforded by this bill. That section preserved to the Queen in Council the powers conferred by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 95, of suspending in certain cases the prohibitions against the admission of pirated books into the colonies; and those powers have been abused to a considerable extent. It would take up too much space here to enter fully into the matter, but it may be enough to state that foreign booksellers and publishers, amongst whom the Americans are conspicuously the chief offenders, inundate our colonies with cheap reprints of English books, and that the owners of the copyright in those books are practically without redress. If, in the revision of our copyright laws, the punishment or prevention of foreign piracy should prove to be impracticable, it would at least be possible to prevent the pirates running the same riot in our colonies as heretofore.

Sect. 40 in this bill is a mere re-enactment of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 95.

It is a more grateful task to observe the instances in which this bill has met the admitted short-comings of the existing law. Copyright in illustrations of works of literature, in lectures, in sermons, in dramatic pieces, and musical compositions, is settled on a more secure basis, and the right of the author of a work of fiction to dramatise the whole or any part of his conceptions is fully recognised. The provision, that international copyright shall not cease between this country and any other with whom it may be at war, is a graceful indication on our part of good intentions, but will be of little avail unless followed up by a corresponding law of the foreign country. The penalties seem mild, and the 8th and 9th sections, pointing out the manner of recovery of penalties, seem to have been accidentally omitted. Altogether, if the select committee will take only ordinary trouble with this bill, they will hardly fail to produce a measure that may satisfactorily pass into law in some future session, although it can scarcely be expected to attain maturity this year.

WE rejoice to see, that in the case of Reg. v. Samuel Porter (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 547), the Court of Criminal Appeal has been able to arrive at a decision, brushing away a technical objection, which might have prevented the punishment of a person, whose misconduct richly deserved it.

The case against Samuel Porter, who was convicted at the last Cornwall Assizes for having wilfully neglected his brother, a lunatic, whom he had taken into his care, must be fresh in the memory of all who read the disgusting details of the ill-treatment and neglect of that unfortunate man.

The counsel, however, for the prisoner, objected that the case was not within the 9th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, under which the indictment was framed, as that section did not apply to the care and charge taken by a man of his brother, a lunatic, in his own private house, but only to persons having the care of lunatics in registered hospitals or licensed houses.

The Court, however, were unanimously of opinion, that notwithstanding the relationship between himself and the lunatic, the defendant was a person "having the care or charge of a lunatic," within the meaning of the statute, and, therefore, might be convicted of the misdemeanour.

This decision renders it unnecessary to legislate further to meet the offence of which the defendant was guilty.

It is to be hoped, that the disclosures which took place in this case, will make the visitors of lunatics more vigilant, and that it will cause all persons to feel, when they have good reason to suppose a lunatic is ill-treated, either by his relations or others, that it is their bounden duty at once to communicate the facts to the proper authorities.

ALTHOUGH that part of the Lord Chancellor's County Courts Act Amendment Bill which gives equity jurisdiction to the county courts has been blamed, as being likely to give rise to much litigation, we certainly think that it is not open to those objections raised to the other parts of the bill, which can only be cured by almost total omission, or alterations so extensive as to change almost entirely the principle upon which those parts of the bill proceed.

If, however, we grant, as we presume even Lord St. Leonards would do, that most of the rules acted upon by our courts of equity, as contradistinguished from the rules of law, as administered by the courts of common law at Westminster, are founded upon principles of justice, and that much wrong would be done if strict law could not be modified by the interposition of courts of equity, it follows, that in order to meet a vast number of cases where the assistance of courts of equity, as at present constituted, cannot be invoked without great oppression, in consequence of the enormous costs which would necessarily be incurred, in proportion to the subject-matter of litigation, some other tribunals should be created, where the principles of equity, admitted to be beneficial in great cases, should be cheaply administered where the property or matter in dispute is of small value.

Lord St. Leonards, indeed, in his speech in the House of Lords, went so far as to say, that he thought it would be most objectionable to transfer to the county courts the powers of courts of equity, and "that a greater curse could not be inflicted upon the country."

As an illustration of his meaning, his Lordship says, "that when a man possessed of small property died, the course was now, for the parties interested to come to some arrangement, and dispose of their claims amicably; whereas, if this bill passed, each such case would give rise to an equitable suit in the county court, and the whole country would soon be overrun with litigation."

Unfortunately, his Lordship is not quite correct in his statement, for it too often happens that a man with small property dies, and a bill is filed in the High Court of Chancery, and in the end the whole, or nearly the whole, of the property is absorbed in costs, which, when two sets of solicitors, one in the country, the other in town, together with counsel, are employed in a suit, cannot be wondered at.

The same result follows in other cases, as when bills are filed in small matters for specific performance, foreclosure, redemption, &c.

The bill proposes to enact, that "every suit that may now be commenced and prosecuted in the High Court of Chancery may hereafter be brought and prosecuted in the county courts held by virtue of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and the judges thereof shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine the same, subject, nevertheless, to the provisions and restrictions herein-after mentioned; that is to say,

- (1). The sum of money or amount demanded or sought to be recovered by the plaintiff in any such suit shall not, exclusive of interest and costs, exceed the sum of 100*l.*, unless it be a distributive or other share of property sought to be divided or distributed:
- (2). The whole estate or property sought to be divided, distributed, or administered in any suit shall not exceed in value the sum of 500*l.*:
- (3). Where such suit seeks the recovery or sale of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, the annual value thereof, or, where the same shall not be let, the annual sum at which the same shall be assessed to the relief of the poor, shall not exceed the sum of 10*l.*:

- (4). Where such suit relates to the foreclosure, redemption, or sale of any property in mortgage, the amount of the principal of such mortgage shall not exceed 300*l.*:
- (5). Where the suit relates to the dissolution or winding-up of any partnership, the gross value or amount of the whole property, stock, and credits of such partnership shall not exceed the sum of 500*l.*:
- (6). If the suit relate to the specific performance, or to the delivery up or cancelling, of any agreement for the sale or purchase of any property, the whole amount or value of the property shall not exceed the sum of 300*l.*:
- (7). No injunction, or order in the nature of an injunction, shall be granted or made by any county court:
- (8). No suit shall be brought in any county court relating to or involving any question concerning the sanity or insanity of any testator." (Sect. 21).

"Every judge of a county court shall, in addition to the powers now vested in him, have, when acting under the provisions of this act, all the power and authority now vested in any judge of the High Court of Chancery; and every county court treasurer, registrar, and high bailiff, shall discharge, and shall have authority to discharge, all the duties imposed upon him and them by this act, or by any rules and orders to be framed as hereinafter provided." (Sect. 22).

"The duties and obligations of and upon all suitors, jurors, and witnesses, and their liability to penalty and punishment, shall, in any proceeding under this act, be the same as those created, authorised, and imposed by the several statutes now in force relating to county courts." (Sect. 23).

"For the due execution of any judgment, decree, or decretal order made under the authority of this act, or of the rules and orders to be framed as hereinafter provided, the court shall have power to order, and the registrar, upon such order, shall have authority to seal and issue, and the high bailiff to execute, any writ or warrant of possession, writ or warrant of execution, or other process of execution for carrying into effect any judgment, decree, or decretal order of the said court; and such writs, warrants, and processes shall be in the form, and executed at the time and in the manner to be set forth in the rules and orders to be framed as hereinafter provided." (Sect. 24).

"If during the progress of a suit it shall be made to appear to the court that the subject-matter of the suit exceeds the limit, in point of amount, to which the jurisdiction of the county courts is hereby limited, it shall be competent for the court, if it shall think fit, to transfer the suit to the Court of Chancery, and thereupon the suit shall proceed in such one of the Vice-Chancellor's courts as the Lord Chancellor may by general order direct; and such Vice-Chancellor shall have power to regulate the whole of the procedure in the suit when so transferred: provided always, that if the county court shall deem it expedient that the suit should not be so transferred, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to apply to the senior Vice-Chancellor at chambers for an order authorising and directing the suit to be carried on and prosecuted in the county court, notwithstanding such excess in the amount of the limit to which jurisdiction in the matter is hereby given to the county courts; and the Vice-Chancellor, after hearing the defendant or defendants, if he shall deem it right to summon them to appear before him for that purpose, or on default of the appearance of all or any of them, shall have full power to make such order." (Sect. 25).

The bill next provides—

With respect to the court in which proceedings in equity shall be taken. (Sect. 26).

For the remuneration of registrars and high bailiffs in matters of equity. (Sect. 27).

That certain fees are to be taken, out of which judges shall have their salaries increased to such an amount as the fees received will be sufficient to pay to each judge not exceeding 1600*l*. (Sect. 28).

Judgments and decrees are to be registered in the registry of county court judgments in London. (Sect. 29).

Power is given to frame rules and orders. (Sect. 30).

The scale of costs to be framed by the judges. (Sect. 31).

Next come two important sections, which will doubtless give rise to much discussion, viz. that "if any party in a cause in which jurisdiction is given to the county courts by this act shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge on any matter of law or equity, or on the admission or rejection of any evidence, such party may appeal from the same to the Master of the Rolls, or one of the Vice-Chancellors, provided that such party shall, within ten days after such determination or direction, give notice of such appeal to the other party, or his attorney, and also give security, to be approved by the registrar of the county court, for the costs of the appeal, whatever be the event of the appeal, and for the amount of the judgment, decree, or order, if he be the defendant, and the appeal be dismissed; provided nevertheless, that such security, so far as regards the amount of the judgment, decree, or order, shall not be required in any case where the judge of the county court shall have ordered the party appealing to pay the amount of such judgment, decree, or order, into the hands of the registrar of the county court in which such suit shall have been tried, and the same shall have been paid accordingly, or where the judge shall think it right that an appeal be made without any such security; and the said Court of Appeal may either order a new trial, on such terms as it thinks fit, or may order any judgment, decree, or order to be entered for either party, as the case may be, and may make such order, with respect to the costs of the said appeal, as such court may think proper; and such orders shall be final: provided that nothing herein contained shall authorise any party to appeal against any decision of a county court, given upon any question as to the annual rent or rateable value, or as to the value of any real or personal property, for the purpose of determining the question of the jurisdiction of the court under this act, nor to appeal against the decision of a county court, on the ground that the proceedings might or should have been taken in any other county court." (Sect. 32).

"Such appeal shall be in the form of a case agreed on by all parties, or their attorneys; and if they cannot agree, the judge of the county court, upon being applied to by them or their attorneys, shall settle the case, and sign it; and such case shall be transmitted by the appellant to the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs in Chancery." (Sect. 33).

On the whole, although this part of the bill will require some amendments, it will, we think, be a very useful measure.

If equity is good for the rich, why should it not be so for the poorer classes?

If the measure does lead to increased litigation, as it doubtless will, it does not follow that such litigation will be an evil. If thereby justice is done between man and man, if injustice is prevented, if access to the High Court of Chancery is thereby rendered unnecessary, and forbidden in those cases, where to approach it is ruin, this part of the Lord Chancellor's measure will effect much good.

Above all, however, we think this part of the measure is important, as being a great step towards the fusion of law and equity; until which is effected, law as a science will never flourish in this country.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Very considerable inconvenience was occasioned to a great number of persons by the closing of the Wills Office, at Doctors' Commons, on the 30th of last month. Many persons who had come a considerable distance from the country were astonished to find the doors of the office closed, with an announcement upon the door, that the officials were enjoying a holiday.

I should like very much to know by whose order the office was so closed, and, if by any order, under what authority such order was made; and whether any proper announcement, and where, was made to the public of such order, so that they might, at any rate, have a chance of knowing that wills could not be seen at Doctors' Commons on that day, and consequently be saved the trouble and expense of useless journeys.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

A DISAPPOINTED APPLICANT

at Doctors' Commons on the 30th May, 1864.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—I observe, from the Times report of May 30, that the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench has declared that for the future serjeants-at-law, not having patents of precedence, shall have seats within the bar in term time. So far as we can see, a very proper arrangement. Some remarks are made in the report, as to the origin and precedence of those who are usually, but, we believe, erroneously, called "Queen's Counsel." These are, in truth, members of the Concilium Legale Regis, described by Lord Hale—a body of unknown antiquity, which includes the judges, though they have ceased to act since the revolution. Her Majesty's letters-patent, authorising silk, are addressed, "To our trusty and well-beloved" A. B., and constitute that favoured individual "one of our council, learned in the law," granting him "place, precedence, and pre-eminence in our courts and elsewhere," but interdicting him from acting "against the Queen." Lord Bacon's patent is in this style. The degree of the coif, on the other hand, that of a puisne serjeant, indicates a popular functionary who is to give legal advice and forensic aid to all, and to do, as the oath quaintly expresses it, according to the measure of his "cunning"—a word which, in the Plantagenet times, had a respectable import, very different from its modern signification.

Yours faithfully,

M.

Lincoln's-inn.

Monday, May 30.

Mr. Hodgkinson asked, in reference to the Solicitor-General's statement in the Court of Exchequer on Thursday last, that the case of The Attorney-General v. Laird and Others, relating to the seizure of the Confederate rams, had been arranged; whether the arrangement alluded to involved the purchase of those vessels, and if so, whether only at their fair value or at some higher price; whether the inducement to the Crown to make such arrangement was a doubt as to the construction and application of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act with regard to equipping and arming vessels; whether it was part of the terms of arrangement, that the alleged misdemeanour, under the 7th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act, should be condoned by the Crown, and that no claim for compensation for the seizure should be made by the defendants; and whether any legislation would be proposed in order to obviate in future the doubts and difficulties attending the construction and enforcing of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and thus prevent the arrangement of the recent case operating as a premium to shipbuilders to speculate on building vessels of war for belligerents.

The Attorney-General said—There was no admission that anybody had been guilty of a violation of the law. The Government stated that they would be prepared, for various reasons, to put an end to the matter on the terms of paying a fair value, but not upon the terms of paying any higher price. That value was much less than the sum first asked, and much less than the owners stated they could obtain from other purchasers if they had the command of the vessels. The parties closed with the Government offer, and on that footing the arrangement was made. As to whether the inducement to the Crown to make such an arrangement was a doubt as to the construction and application of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, the House is as well able to judge as I am as to the doubts which are prevalent, but, in this particular case, having regard to the particular nature of these ships, those doubts had no considerable place in the motives of the Government for entering into the arrangement. I am bound to say that it was not on account of any doubt in the minds of the advisers of the Crown that they were induced on their part to consent to the arrangement. Besides the security to the public, the Government had no desire to inflict any loss upon private individuals. As to the question how far the subjects of the Crown had a right to construct ships for the belligerents, no doubt opinions had been given by which individuals might be led to believe that they were right in acting in opposition to the views expressed by the Government, and, therefore, they might have acted under a bona fide belief that they were not exceeding the provisions of the law. The House, of course, would understand that these persons contended that they had not violated the law, and the Government entering into the arrangement did not affirm that they had been guilty. As to the terms of arrangement, no compensation was contemplated as part of the arrangement, and the Government did not proceed on the ground of a misdemeanour having been committed. As to the last part of the question, I have to state that I hope it will not be found necessary to propose any new legislation upon this subject, but the Government hope that all parties will so profit by what has taken place that no further prosecution of the kind will be rendered necessary. But the Government are as determined as ever to maintain the law as they understand it if its infraction should be attempted, and they do not consider that this arrangement will offer a premium to other shipbuilders to fit out such vessels, seeing that the owners represent that they would have been enabled to obtain a more profitable market if the ships had been completely under their control.

MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

On the vote of 9574*l.* for the expenses of Probate Court registries,

Mr. Hadfield asked that the committee might be furnished with a detailed list of the expenses and fees received. They were receiving 3,000,000*l.* a year, which were collected from the public in fees, out of which the proctors' compensation was paid, and he thought they should know if there was any chance of the fees to suitors being reduced.

Mr. Alderman Rose called attention to the custody of the wills in the present building, which, he understood, was not fire-proof. He wished to know if the Government had made arrangements for transferring them to some safer place of deposit.

Mr. Couper said, he shared the alarm of the hon. gentleman, for he believed a railway was to be carried under the present building, and a street through it. However, nothing could be done in the present case till the Government had given permission, and until after the wills and documents had been carefully removed; it was proposed ultimately to deposit them in the basement of the new courts of justice. He believed the present building was fire-proof, but it was surrounded with houses and offices which were not. The larger portion of the expenses connected with the Probate Court would be found under the head of law and justice, where the point raised by the hon. member for Sheffield could be better discussed than on this vote, which was for the expense of a new building for Manchester.

Mr. Alderman Rose asked when the right hon. gentleman proposed to find a new building for the wills. He understood the Board of Works was in possession of the land.

Mr. Couper said, that by the act the Board of Works could not take possession of the building without the assent of the Lords of the Treasury, and the hon. gentleman might depend upon it, they would not give their assent until after they had found a place of deposit for the wills and the documents. That would be done in ample time. The Lords of the Treasury would not neglect such an important duty.

The vote was then agreed to.

The Vacating of Seats (House of Commons) Bill was read a third time.

The Administration of Trusts (Scotland) Bill was read a second time.

The College of Physicians Bill was read a second time.

The Banking Co-partnerships Bill was read a second time.

The Burials Registration Bill was read a third time.

Mr. H. Seymour obtained leave to bring in a bill for facilitating the management and improvement of certain estates belonging to the Bank of England.

Mr. Hodgkinson gave notice, that on that day month he would call attention to the subject of Endowed Grammar Schools, and submit a motion on the subject.

Mr. Hankey obtained leave to bring in a bill for defraying out of fees a portion of the expense of carrying into effect the Charitable Trusts Act, 1863.

The Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland Commission.

A royal commission, dated the 21st September, 1863, was issued to J. D. Fitzgerald, one of the justices of the Court of Queen's Bench, Ireland; M. Longfield, one of the judges of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland; the late Sir William Atherton, A. G.; Sir R. J. Phillimore, Advocate-General; Sir Thomas Staples, Advocate-General for Ireland; T. O'Hagan, Attorney-General for Ireland; R. P. Collier, Esq. (now Solicitor-General); P. B. Follett, Esq.; H. Cadogan Rothery, Esq.; and John Haalitt, Esq.; with William N. Hancock, Doctor of Laws, and H. R.

Yaughan Johnson, Esq., as secretaries to the Commissioners, to inquire into the Constitution, Establishment, Officers, Practice, Procedure, and Fees of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland.

The commissioners have made their Report, dated the 21st May, 1864, containing much valuable and interesting information upon the subjects on which they were desired to report.

The Report treats at some length on the following subjects:—1. Admiralty jurisdiction in Ireland prior to the Restoration. 2. Admiralty Courts in Ireland from 1660 to 1782. 3. Present constitution of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland. 4. Report on the Court of Admiralty of Ireland in 1829, by the Commissioners of the Courts of Justice. 5. Exercise of prize jurisdiction by the Irish Admiralty Courts. 6. Changes effected in the High Court of Admiralty of England. 7. Present state of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland. 8. Fees of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland. 9. Amount of business transacted by the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland. 10. Extension of the jurisdiction, and improvement of the practice, of the court. 11. Proposed extension of jurisdiction to freight, demurrage, &c. 12. Discharge of the judicial duties of the court. 13. Provisions for appeal. 14. Salary of the judge. 15. All officers of the court to be placed on salary. 16. Retiring pension of the present registrar of the court. 17. Compensation to the registrar of the Court of Delegates. 18. Compensation to proctors. 19. Proctors' apprentices.

The recommendations of the commissioners to her Majesty are as follows:—

I. JURISDICTION, PRACTICE, AND PROCEDURE.

1. Assimilation.

That the jurisdiction, practice, and procedure of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland should, as far as practicable, be assimilated to the jurisdiction, practice, and procedure of the High Court of Admiralty of England.

2. Appellate Jurisdiction.

- i. That the Court of Delegates should be abolished as a Court of Appeal from the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland.
- ii. That an appeal from the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland should lie to the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Ireland, with power to the Court to call in nautical assessors to its assistance.
- iii. That an appeal should lie from the Court of Appeal in Ireland to your Majesty in Council, provision being made to enable your Majesty to add to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council one or more members of your Majesty's Privy Council in Ireland.
- iv. That the appellant should be at liberty to make his appeal in the first instance to your Majesty in Council, without resorting to the intermediate Court of Appeal.
- v. That the practice and procedure on appeals from the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland should be assimilated, as far as practicable, to the practice and procedure on appeals from the High Court of Admiralty of England.

3. Power of making General Orders.

That the power of making Orders to regulate the practice and procedure of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland should be given to the judge of that court, subject to such Orders being confirmed by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the Lord Justice of Appeal in Ireland.

4. Proposed Extension of Jurisdiction.

That in case it should be deemed expedient to extend the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty of England to questions of freight and demurrage, and other questions of a similar nature likely to arise between the masters or owners of vessels and merchants, it would be desirable that a similar extension of jurisdiction should be given to the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland.

5. Security of Money of Suitors.

That all money of suitors should be lodged in the Bank of Ireland to the credit of the particular cause or matter, with the privity of the registrar, and should not be drawn out, except under the order of the Court, by a draft signed by the registrar, and countersigned by the judge.

II. ESTABLISHMENT.

1. Separate Court.

That it is desirable to maintain a court for the exercise of the Instance Jurisdiction in Admiralty in Ireland.

2. Judicial Establishment.

- i. That it is not expedient that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty should be attached to any of the superior courts of common law in Ireland.
- ii. That as the changes we have recommended, if adopted, will probably have the effect of largely increasing the business of the Court, and to an extent which we are unable at present to estimate, we are of opinion that, until the extent of the increase of business has been ascertained, it cannot be determined whether it is expedient that the same person should be judge of the Court of Probate and of the Court of Admiralty in Ireland.
- iii. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion, that the most expedient course is to continue at present the separate judge of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland.
- iv. That it is not expedient that the judge should have the power of appointing a surrogate, or of practising as a barrister, or of sitting in Parliament; we, therefore, think it will be necessary to increase the salary of the judge, which, in our opinion, should not be less than 1000*l.* per annum.
- v. That provision should be made, that in case of the illness or unavoidable absence of the judge, or in any suit or matter in which the judge shall have an interest, a judge of one of the superior courts of common law, or the judge of the Court of Probate, to whom it may be convenient to attend, shall, at the request of the Lord Chancellor, sit for the judge of the court, and exercise all his powers. (See stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 79).

3. Official Establishment.

- i. That the registrar should act as secretary to the judge, and should also discharge the duties of the office of seal keeper.
- ii. That according to the precedent established in the Court of Probate in Ireland and the Landed Estates Court, all the officers of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland should be appointed by the judge, subject to the approval of the Lord Chancellor, to hold office subject to removal by the judge, with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor.
- iii. That the registrar and all other officers of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland should be required to perform their duties in person, except in case of temporary illness, or other reasonable cause, when some other officer or suitable person should be selected by the judge to supply the officer's place.

- iv. That the present registrar of the court, who holds his office by patent during pleasure, with power to act by deputy, and who has served for twenty-seven years, should have the option of retiring on full compensation.
- v. That the duty of attending the Court of Appeal in Chancery, in Admiralty appeals, should devolve on the registrar of the Court of Admiralty of Ireland.
- vi. That the present registrar of the Court of Delegates, who has held office for upwards of forty-two years, should receive compensation on the abolition of appeals in Admiralty cases to that court.

III. FEES.

Appointments.

Mr. Philip Henry Pepys, principal secretary to the Lord Chancellor, has been appointed a registrar in the Court of Bankruptcy, in the room of the Hon. R. Bethell, resigned. Mr. Augustus B. Abraham has been appointed principal secretary. Mr. John Stuart, son of Vice-Chancellor Stuart, will succeed Mr. Abraham as Secretary of Presentations.

We understand that Mr. Cuthbert Ellison, of the Inner Temple, who was formerly of the Home Circuit, until his appointment as stipendiary magistrate at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, will be appointed as a Metropolitan police magistrate at the Worship-street Police-court, in the room of Mr. Leigh, who has resigned. Mr. Cuthbert Ellison is now stipendiary magistrate at Manchester.

WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.—CHANGE OF ASSIZE TOWN.—Information has been received in Leeds that the Privy Council have decided on recommending her Majesty to grant an order for the holding of Assizes for the West Riding of Yorkshire at Leeds, instead of at York, as heretofore. It is expected that the change will take place at the ensuing Summer Assizes. Leeds, like York, will be in the Midland Circuit.

THE RELATIVE PRECEDENCE OF QUEEN'S COUNSEL AND SERJEANTS-AT-LAW.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Saturday, the Lord Chief Justice announced that in future all serjeants-at-law, whether with or without patents of precedence, would sit within the bar. The Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer has also noticed that the like privilege will be extended to his court. This privilege of sitting within the bar in these two courts has hitherto, for many years past, been limited to Queen's counsel and to those serjeants or barristers-at-law having patents of precedence. The serjeants are the more ancient order of legal practitioners, and in former times enjoyed many exclusive privileges. The last of them was their exclusive right to practise in the Court of Common Pleas, which was abolished in 1846, when by statute this right was abolished, and the practice of that court was thrown open to barristers of all ranks. By the effect of the present proceeding of the superior courts, therefore, serjeants-at-law now enjoy the same privileges in all courts of inferior jurisdiction.

THE CONVOCATIONS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

—Our convocations are now assembled as follows:—The royal writs convening them are issued by the Crown, together with the writs for calling together the Parliament. These writs are issued to the archbishops, who are commanded to call together the bishops of each province, the deans, archdeacons, chapters, colleges, and the clergy of each diocese. On the receipt of the royal writ the archbishop issues his mandate. The Archbishop of Canterbury directs his to the Bishop of London, who summons the other bishops of the province; and each bishop in his turn directs a mandate to the dean and chapter of his cathedral, and to his archdeacons; and these last cite the clergy of the archdeaconries to meet in order to elect proctors. The proceedings in the province of York differ slightly. Now, since all these forms are gone through at the present day whenever a new Parliament is summoned, why are not our provincial convocations in as full vigour as our Parliament? It would take up too much space to answer this question fully; but it may be sufficient to say that the royal license to deliberate on canons (without which license canons certainly cannot be enacted) has not been granted to convocation since the year 1777. It is generally believed that the reason for which it was then withheld was, because the lower house of the convocation of the province of Canterbury gave offence to the Government by their opposition to a sermon preached by Dr. Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor, and to a book published by him. But although no license to treat on or enact canons, has since that date been granted to our convocations, they have been, as has been said, regularly summoned. They are thus allowed to be part of our constitution; and if, in the long course of years during which they have been so convened, there has not been on the part of the bishops of the church an earnest desire and endeavour to see that the work which belonged to these bodies was done by them, we must, at all events, not blame only the civil power for the silence of the church in her synods.—Churchman's Family Magazine.

Together with the Acts of Parliament, Forms, and Precedents relating to the subject. Being especially intended for popular use in Seaport Towns. By W. T. GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. Greenhow, brings into a popular shape, and to the latest date, the entire body of legal regulations affecting the shipping trade of the country alike in relation to owners, merchants, masters, and seamen, and is especially adapted for ordinary use by all persons connected with the business of seaport towns."—Times, Jan. 31, 1863.

"The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. But Mr. Greenhow has achieved it, and placed within reach of every one connected with shipping a valuable compendium of the law relating to that branch of industry."—Shipping and Mercantile Gazette.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 11, 1864.

LORD WESTBURY'S County Court Act Amendment Bill, which we have already discussed (ante, pp. 199 and 212), seems likely to receive considerable alteration and amendment in the House of Lords. We commented (ante, p. 199) on the unreasonable shortness of the period of one year, which the Chancellor's bill proposed as the statutory limitation for debts of a certain amount, and we are glad to find that both Lord Chelmsford and Lord St. Leonards propose to substitute the period of three years; Lord Chelmsford's amendment also introducing the saving effect of a part payment as well as of an acknowledgment in writing. Lord St. Leonards also proposes to introduce the following clause:—"No packman or person taking or sending his goods for sale from house to house shall recover against the husband or father of any wife or daughter to whom any such goods shall have been, or shall hereafter be, sold, for the price of the same, unless such husband or father shall have been present at such sale, and sanctioned the same."

This is a very important clause, and would, no doubt, afford a great protection in many cases to husbands and fathers, but we think it will require to be modified, as it may open the door to fraud on their part. A husband may give the most express direction and authority to his wife to order goods from the packman, and, in the present form of the clause, he may even give her a written authority to order the goods, that she may shew it to the packman, and yet he may resist payment, because he was not present at the sale. This would be a manifest injustice. Probably some provision may be introduced, that the husband or father shall not be liable unless the wife or daughter has his antecedent authority for ordering the goods; and some mode of giving the authority may be devised, in order that there may be clear proof of it when the packman goes for his debt. At all events, we think that the clause in its present shape is too stringent.

Lord St. Leonards also proposes to leave out all the clauses relating to equitable jurisdiction. We do not think this alteration expedient, or likely to be carried.

The provisions as to fraudulent and insolvent judgment debtors, whose debts and liabilities are small, are numerous, and will, no doubt, be much discussed. Among them there is one clause, which is novel, and will, we think, meet with considerable opposition. It is this:—

"A copy of every order by which a debtor is ordered to pay into court any sum weekly, or at other intervals, shall be sent by post by the high bailiff, under the seal of the court, to the person by whom such debtor is employed, or in whose service he is on hire; and the person receiving such order is hereby authorised and required to retain out of the wages due, or money earned from time to time to or by such debtor, the weekly or other instalment directed to be paid, and the money so retained shall be accounted for and paid by such persons to the high bailiff, upon his application for the same."

This clause thus places the employers of labour in the position of officers of the county court—a distinction which they can have no desire to attain. Suppose a millowner, or other large employer of labour, to have several hundred men in his employ. There is no improbability in his receiving fifty orders, and being required to pay over to the county court the wages of fifty of his men at the same time, it would be almost necessary for him to keep a clerk for the purpose of duly observing these orders, and keeping himself clear of contempts of Court. The provision is also likely to expose the master to disagreeable conflicts with his men when he retains their wages under the orders of the Court; and on the whole, we think it is a protection to which the creditor is not entitled.

The bill contains several provisions as to actions brought in the superior courts for debts or liquidated money demands of 20*l.* and under; the object of them being to deprive the plaintiffs in such cases of their costs, and to compel them to sue in the county court. They enable the defendants in such cases to apply to a judge for an order remitting the case to the county court, and will, we trust, be carried. And then comes a provision applicable to certain actions of tort.

"It shall be lawful for any person against whom an action for malicious prosecution, illegal arrest, illegal distress, assault, false imprisonment, seduction, or other actions of tort may be brought in a superior court, to make an affidavit that the plaintiff has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant, should a verdict be not found for the plaintiff; and thereupon a judge of the court in which the action is brought shall have power to make an order, that unless the plaintiff shall, within a time to be therein mentioned, give full security for the defendant's costs, to the satisfaction of one of the Masters of the said court, all proceedings in the action shall be stayed; or that, in the event of the plaintiff being unable or unwilling to give such security, that the cause be remitted for trial before a county court to be therein named; and thereupon the plaintiff shall lodge the order with the registrar of such county court, who shall appoint a day for hearing of the cause, notice whereof shall be sent, by post or otherwise, by the registrar, to both parties, or their attorneys, and the county court so named shall have all the same powers and jurisdiction with respect to the cause as if both parties had agreed, by a memorandum signed by them, that the said county court should have power to try the said action, and the same had been commenced by plaint in the said county court; and the costs of the parties shall be allowed according to the scale of costs in use in the county courts, and the costs of issuing the writ of summons, and any other proceedings in the superior court, shall also be allowed to the successful party, according to the scale in use in such latter court."

This is a most salutary provision, and one which we can imagine certain individuals contemplating with terror and dismay. Every person who has any experience of the Nisi Prius business of the courts knows well that trumpery actions, and the most trifling accidents, are often taken up and fought from beginning to end by persons who look only to the verdict of the jury for their fees, charges, and costs, and who undertake that the plaintiffs shall be at no expense even if they lose. They trust to the sympathies of the jury, and the much-abused appeal for justice for a poor man. The result is, that many persons, although they are not legally, or even morally, liable to make compensation, prefer compromising an unfounded demand to the risk of an adverse, or even of a favourable, verdict. We do earnestly hope that this provision will be carried, and when carried, that the judges will act heartily and vigorously upon it. Half their time at Nisi Prius is occupied by such actions, and they well know how partial juries are to the plaintiffs in them. The poor man is not deprived of justice, for he can go to the county court if he believes he has a just claim, and there is no reason whatever for supposing that he will not obtain justice there. The only persons, perhaps, who have a right to complain are the county court judges themselves, upon whom a fresh burthen would thus be cast; but we do not think that, practically, this will be found to be the case, for it will not be worth the while of those who hunt up and instigate these actions to conduct them in the county courts.

We repeat our earnest hope that this provision may pass into law; possibly it may be modified when it comes under discussion, although at present it does not appear to us to require modification. We also repeat our hope that the judges will not hesitate to apply it when they are called upon to do so.

Upon the whole, there is good reason for thinking that this bill of Lord Westbury will eventually become a wise and salutary measure, and sweep away some existing abuses in the law.

THE summary jurisdiction conferred by the Divorce Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 21) enabling a police magistrate within a metropolitan district, the justices in petty sessions, or the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, to grant to a wife deserted by her husband, an order protecting her earnings and property acquired since the commencement of the desertion, has, on the whole, operated most beneficially.

A singular defect, however, has been discovered in a clause of the act (sect. 23), which enables the husband, or his creditors, or any person claiming under him, to apply to the Court, or to the magistrate or justices by whom a protecting order has been made, for the discharge thereof, for it has been decided that a police magistrate has no jurisdiction to rescind an order made by his colleague, even though such colleague may have died since the order was made; and it seems also to be doubtful whether the Court has jurisdiction. (Re Mary Elizabeth Sharpe, 12 Weekly Rep., Q. B., 756).

In order to prevent the inconvenience and injustice which might arise from its not being possible to discharge a protecting order improperly obtained, Lord St. Leonards has brought in a short bill, intitled "An Act to amend the Act relating to Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85," which enacts, that in case the order shall have been made by a police magistrate, and the said magistrate shall have died or been removed, or have become incapable of acting, then in every such case the husband or creditor, or any person claiming under the husband, may apply to the magistrate for the time being acting as the successor, or in the place of the magistrate who made the order of protection, for the discharge of it, who shall have authority to make an order discharging the same; and an order for discharge of an order for protection may be applied for to, and be granted by, the Court, although the order for protection was not made by the Court; and an order for protection made at one petty sessions may be discharged by the justices of any later petty sessions, or by the Court.

25 & 26 VICT. c. 42 (MR. BOLT'S ACT).

It is now pretty generally admitted among law reformers, that the distinction between law and equity is altogether to be condemned; and that there ought to be but one set of Courts to try all kinds of questions. However correct this view may be in theory, few will deny that there is little probability of such a fundamental revolution in our judicial system for a considerable time to come. Such being the case, it is clearly desirable, that whenever a matter is brought before any Court, whether of law or of equity, that Court should give complete and satisfactory relief as to the whole matter; and that suitors should not be bandied about from one side of Westminster Hall to the other, and back again, before they can get justice done in the whole matter in question. To attain this object was the aim of the act which we are now considering. Various prior acts had, indeed, conferred power upon the Court of Chancery to give complete relief in all cases brought before it; but judges are mortal men, and the power of usage and of precedent is strong, and it was found, that practically the Court was very slow to avail itself of its new powers, so long as a choice was left to it. Under these circumstances, the present act was passed, with the view of making it absolutely compulsory upon the Court, with one exception, to decide for itself all those questions which it had been in the habit of sending to be tried elsewhere. The real pith and marrow of the act lies in an exceedingly small compass. Sect. 1 enacts, that in all cases in which any relief or remedy within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is or shall be sought, in any cause or matter instituted or pending in that court, and whether the title to such relief or remedy be or be not incident to, or dependent upon, a legal right, every question of law or fact, cognisable in a court of common law, on the determination of which the title to such relief or remedy depends, shall be determined by or before the same Court. The 2nd section provides, that the Court of Chancery may nevertheless direct an issue, to try any question of fact, before a jury at common law, whenever it shall appear to the said Court that such question of fact may be more conveniently so tried. There are other provisions, not necessary to be mentioned here. Considering the importance of the act, it is singular how few decisions upon it have been reported. It would, however, be a great mistake to suppose, that the operation of the act has been confined to this comparatively small number of cases. It has had an indirect, but not unimportant, bearing upon a great number of other cases. We now propose shortly to consider the reported cases.

It was soon decided, in conformity with the obvious intent of the act, that it was no longer allowed to the Court of Chancery to direct a motion or other proceeding to stand over with liberty to bring an action. Some slight doubt was indeed thrown out upon this point by the Lord Justice Knight Bruce in the case of Spencer v. Jack (8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1165); but the point was finally decided by the Lords Justices, in the case of Baylis v. Watkins (Ib.). In that case a decree had been made for the administration of the estate of a deceased person. During his lifetime his wife had commenced proceedings against him in the Divorce Court; and a claim was made by her solicitor against the husband's estate for costs incurred in that suit. The claim was disputed by the executors. Sir J. Stuart, V. C., directed the matter to stand over, with liberty to the solicitor to bring an action. On appeal, the Lords Justices decided, that since the passing of this act, this could not be done, and that the Court was bound to hear and determine the whole matter itself. The same point was decided in Copeland v. Webb (1 N.E. 119); Egmont v. Darell (1 Hem. & Mil. 563); and Re The Catholic Publishing Company (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 192; 12 Weekly Rep. 455). In the case of Curlewis v. Carter (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1118; 12 Weekly Rep. 97), a question arose as to the effect of the statute, where an action at law was pending at the time of the filing of the bill. In that case, the defendant in equity, Mr. Carter, had brought an action of trover against the plaintiff in equity, Mr. Curlewis, to recover possession of some horses. The action was commenced after the passing of the act. Mr. Curlewis then filed his bill for an account, and moved for an injunction to restrain all further proceedings in the action. His counsel argued that the Court was now bound to decide all questions, whether of law or fact, arising in the course of the determination of any cause in Chancery. Sir J. Stuart, V. C., however, dismissed the motion, with costs. This would seem to be right. Had not the action been pending, the Vice-Chancellor would, no doubt, have been bound by the act to decide the questions raised by the action at law; but it could not have been the intention of the act to render it compulsory upon the Court to assist the plaintiff in equity in getting rid of an action in which he might have made a slip, or in which, from any other circumstance, he found himself at a disadvantage. This would in fact be directly contrary to the spirit of the act: which is, that all courts, of whatever kind, should themselves decide all the questions arising in the course of any proceeding before them, instead of sending some such questions to another court for determination. Now, according to the contention of the plaintiff in Curlewis v. Carter, the act would directly cause the transfer of a large number of causes actually pending before courts of law to the Court of Chancery.

This case has some bearing upon the next class of decisions to which we shall refer; which are those in which it has been held that the jurisdiction of the Court, as apart from its practice, has not been in any way altered by the act. In Eaden v. Firth (1 Hem. & Mil. 575), to be again referred to, and in Davenport v. Jenson (1 N.E. 173), it was expressly laid down, that the powers of the Court were not limited, nor was its procedure affected, by the act. In connexion with this branch of the subject, it is important to refer to Johnson v. Wyatt (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1333; 12 Weekly Rep. 234) and to Swaine v. The Great Northern Railway Company (before Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., 9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1196; and before the Lords Justices, 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 191; 12 Weekly Rep. 391). In both these cases the question of damages was before the Court; and Sir Hugh Cairns's Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), giving power to the Court to assess damages, was compared with the present act. In both cases the Court was of opinion, that the exercise of the powers conferred upon the Court by Sir Hugh Cairns's Act was not rendered compulsory by Mr. Rolt's Act. In Johnson v. Wyatt, the Lord Justice Turner merely stated his opinion, that it was not compulsory upon the Court to assess damages, though he would have been disposed to exercise the power of assessing damages given by Sir

Hugh Cairns's Act, had he thought that the plaintiffs had, upon the evidence, made out a sufficient case to entitle them to damages. In Swaine v. The Great Northern Railway Company, the bill was filed to restrain an alleged nuisance. Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., held that the plaintiff was debarred from relief, by way of injunction, on the ground of acquiescence for a long time prior to the filing of the bill. The Lords Justices, on appeal, confirmed his Honor's decision. It was urged, that, at all events, the Court was bound by the present act to decide the question of damages. We cite, upon this point, the following passage from the judgment of the Lord Justice Turner:—"I do not think that Mr. Rolt's Act makes it compulsory upon the Court to give damages. . . . Now, looking at the nature of the case, I think that it is not a case in which we should be well advised to go into the question of damages. The bill must be dismissed, as the bill in Johnson v. Wyatt was dismissed, though not exactly on the same grounds, for there we were of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages at all. We do not say that here; but the case would be more effectually disposed of in a court of law than here. Mr. Rolt's Act has placed the Court in the position of being compelled to decide questions of fact on insufficient statements contained in affidavits, or else by examining all the witnesses, and this sometimes places the Court in great difficulty. In this particular case the question of damages could be better disposed of in a court of law than here. The bill must be dismissed, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to bring such action as may be advised."

These cases must, we presume, be considered to have settled that the right to damages, when unconnected with any other species of relief, is not such a "relief or remedy, within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery," as is contemplated by the act. No doubt, if the Lords Justices had, in the case last mentioned, considered themselves bound to decide the question of damages, while dismissing the bill on all other grounds, the consequences might have been rather serious. Bills might have been filed simply with a view to obtain damages, with a merely colourable prayer for an injunction, or perhaps without any at all. On the other hand, as the Court of Chancery has power to assess damages, and, if thought necessary for that purpose, to summon a jury, hear witnesses in court, &c., in the same manner as a court of law, it would seem better that, where a bill is actually before it, the Court should decide itself the question of damages, if any such question should arise, instead of resorting to the old and long-condemned practice of leaving the parties to bring an action at law. It will be observed, that in Johnson v. Wyatt Lord Justice Turner did go into, and decide, the question of damages, though at the same time expressing his opinion that he was not obliged to do so by the present act. It would appear, therefore, that the Courts will determine, upon the circumstances of each particular case, whether they will or will not go into the question of damages. In both the above cases the bill failed, in so far as it prayed any other relief besides that of damages. But supposing an injunction to be granted, we apprehend that, following the above cases, the Court would not be compelled to decide the amount of damages, even if damages were prayed by the bill. It would, however, be highly desirable that the Court should do so in all cases in which the point of damages is pressed.

Covgill v. Rhodes (12 Weekly Rep. 190) is not important; but Re The Catholic Publishing Company (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 192; 12 Weekly Rep. 455) raised a somewhat curious point. In that case the Master of the Rolls decided, according to the marginal note, that if a creditor presents a petition for a winding-up order against a company, and the validity of the debt is in dispute, the Court is bound, under the present act, to determine for itself the question of the existence of the debt, and is precluded from ordering the petition to stand over until the debt has been established at law. His Honor accordingly proceeded to an examination of the evidence, and made an order thereupon. The Lords Justices, upon appeal (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 301), reversed his Honor's decision, and dismissed the petition, with costs. Their Lordships appear, however, to have come to this conclusion upon the merits of the particular case; though it may be inferred from their judgments that they did not consider themselves bound to decide the existence of the debt.

Another very important point relates to the practice of granting issues. It will be remembered that the 2nd section of the act preserves to the Court the power of directing an issue, whenever it shall appear to the Court that any question of fact may be more conveniently so tried. The effect of the decisions upon this point appears to be, that the Court will only avail itself of the option thus left to it under special circumstances, and that it prefers to try such questions itself, with the assistance of a jury, if necessary. This view is clearly in accordance with the spirit of the act, and of the whole course of modern legislation; and we hope that it will be steadily adhered to, even although it may, in particular cases, lead to some inconvenience.

The first case to which we shall refer on this point, is the now famous suit of Young v. Fernie, the trial in which has occupied Vice-Chancellor Stuart's Court for so long a period. Sir J. Stuart, V. C., upon the cause first coming before him, directed an issue to try the validity of the patent. The cause then came before the Lord Chancellor on appeal, and is reported 10 Jur., N. S., 58; 12 Weekly Rep. 221, when his Lordship reversed the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. After referring to the present act, his Lordship said—"I construe the statute thus: that the rule is for the future to be, that these questions shall be decided in Chancery; and that the proviso contained in the 2nd section is to be the exception. The Court must be satisfied that justice will be better done in the particular case in question, by directing an issue, in order to bring the case within the exception. In a patent cause, I do not think anything can be more inconvenient than that, where questions of law and fact are bound up together, the two classes of questions should be separated, and be decided in different courts."

Another celebrated case, Egmont v. Darell (1 Hem. & Mil. 563), is important, in consequence of the observations which fell from Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., in the course of his judgment, p. 568. His Honor referred to the view entertained by Lord Eldon (Pemberton v. Pemberton, 11 Ves. 50), that it was better to direct terms to be set aside, with a view to bringing an action, than to direct an issue; for this reason, that, in the former case, a motion for a new trial would come before the common-law court which tried the action, whereas, in the case of an issue, the motion for a new trial would come before the Court of Chancery. Upon the same principle, his Honor stated that he should, now that an action was forbidden by Mr. Rolt's Act, prefer to try the case himself, with the assistance of a jury, instead of directing an issue; because, in the former case, the Court of Chancery, before which the trial was held, would be the Court to decide whether or no there should be a new trial; whereas, if he were to direct an issue, the case would be tried before a common-law court, but the motion for a new trial would come before himself in Chancery.

This opinion of his Honor seems to be in accordance with that expressed by the Lord Chancellor in Young v. Fernie, as well as with the obvious spirit and intention of the act; and the Master of the Rolls, in Williams v. Williams (12 Weekly Rep. 140), appears to have been disposed to follow the same course, though in that case his Honor came to the conclusion that there ought to be no trial whatever. It is, however, not altogether easy to reconcile these opinions with the course adopted by Vice-Chancellor Wood in the case of Eaden v. Firth (1 Hem. & Mil. 573). In this case a motion was made for an injunction to restrain the continuance of an alleged nuisance. The Vice-Chancellor was urged by the plaintiff's counsel, in the first place, to decide the question of nuisance or no nuisance himself, without a jury; or, secondly, if he required a jury, to summon it before himself. On the first point, he said, "I do not think the act (Mr. Rolt's Act) intended to introduce any alteration in the principles on which this Court acts; and, therefore, I consider that the defendant is still entitled to carry his case to a jury in any instance in which he would, before that act, have been entitled to require the plaintiff to establish his right at law." As to the second point, his Honor said, that he saw no reason for withdrawing the question from the jury, who would have had to try it if the plaintiff had, in the first instance, gone to law; and he directed an issue accordingly. As to the first point, we apprehend that his Honor must not be understood to say, that he had no authority to decide the question himself without a jury (which was the course adopted by Vice-Chancellor Stuart in Young v. Fernie), had he thought fit to do so. As to the second point, it is difficult to see why the observations made by the same judge in Egmont v. Darell, referred to above, as to the inexpediency of directing an issue, would not equally have applied to Eaden v. Firth. Nor does it appear very obvious, from the report of the case, what special circumstances there were, sufficient to take the case out of the rule laid down by the Lord Chancellor in Young v. Fernie; unless, indeed, it was thought that local knowledge was desirable on the part of the jury, for the purpose of deciding the question of nuisance or no nuisance.

One more case, and we have done. Clarkson v. Edge (12 Weekly Rep. 518) is a curious, and to some extent an exceptional, case. The circumstances, which were somewhat complicated, were as follows:—Previously to the year 1860, Edge, one of the defendants, carried on business in London as a gas-meter manufacturer, gas engineer, and gas-fitter. In that year he became bankrupt. His business was sold, and was purchased by the plaintiff Clarkson and Edge's son, the other defendant, as partners. Edge the elder was engaged, as part of the arrangement, to superintend the business, and he gave his bond not to exercise the business of a gas-meter manufacturer and gas engineer, not mentioning that of a gas-fitter, within a certain limit. Subsequently he took orders for gas-fittings, which he executed on the premises of the partnership. The bill prayed for an injunction to restrain Edge the elder from carrying on the business of a gas-fitter, and for an account. It was contended on the one side, that the gas-fitting business was not included in the bond; and, on the other side, that it was merely a branch of the business of a gas engineer. The Master of the Rolls granted an injunction against carrying on the business of a gas-fitter on the plaintiff's premises, with an account of the monies so received; but he stated that he felt very great difficulty in deciding whether or no the gas-fitting business was included in the bond, upon which depended the question, whether or no the plaintiff was entitled to a general injunction to restrain Edge the elder from carrying on that trade within the limits mentioned in the bond. His Honor at first proposed to direct the cause to stand over, with liberty to bring an action to decide this point; but, upon his attention being drawn by counsel to the present act, he held that he was prevented from taking that course. He considered that it was not a case for directing an issue, and therefore dismissed the bill altogether, so far as it prayed an injunction against the carrying on the gas-fitting business, without costs, and without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to bring an action on the bond. It certainly appears to us exceedingly difficult to see upon what principle this case is to be supported. Here was a simple question of construction. Evidence had been gone into at length on both sides, and his Honor, for no apparent reason, except that the point was a difficult one, takes the extraordinary step of dismissing the bill altogether on this point, while granting relief at the same time as to other parts of the same transaction. Should the plaintiff bring his action, and succeed, he would have, we presume, to file a fresh bill to obtain the injunction, to which he would then have proved his right, unless, indeed, the common-law courts should see fit to grant an injunction, which in such a case they probably would do. His Honor had full power to summon a jury, to hear witnesses in court, or to take any other steps which he might consider necessary for determining the question; and it is difficult to see in what way a common-law court could be better qualified to decide the point than the Court of Chancery. In the meanwhile, the very evil which the present act was designed to repress, appears in this case to have been produced by its means in a peculiarly aggravated form.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, June 2.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURE BILL.

Lord Redesdale, in moving the committal of this bill, said that it had originally come before their lordships as a private bill, but it was now introduced as a public measure, and its provisions, therefore, if dangerous or objectionable, would now be more open to correction.

Lord Portman and Earl Grey spoke in favour of the bill.

Lord Overstone believed most solemnly that when Parliament was legislating on such a subject, it ought not to give any indirect sanction to companies and concerns which might not be really deserving of public confidence. His first objection was, that the debentures issued by companies would go forth as mortgage debentures, whereas they were nothing of the kind. They were merely acknowledgments of debts by a public company. Next, the indirect consequences of the transactions which were likely to arise from the formation of these companies would lead to a wholesale system of registration; but registration would not give to the holders of these debentures that legal security to which they were entitled. His third objection was, that the bill would authorise trustees, who, by the trust, were only empowered to invest money on the best security, to invest it in debentures of this kind. A company must pay the full rate of interest to their subscribers. Then how could they afford to pay interest upon mortgage debentures as well, except by borrowing the money on inferior classes of mortgage securities. As an illustration, he might mention the Land Investment Society, sanctioned by the high character of a noble duke, which advertised that they were ready to lend money upon landed security, upon houses in the course of construction, either with or without a deposit of deeds. And then followed another advertisement from the same company, stating that they were prepared to issue mortgage debentures on the security of houses in course of construction with or without the deposit of the deeds. Now, with regard to the question of trustees, their investments ought to be in securities of the best class, but if they invested in these mortgage debentures, their only remedy would be against the company, and if they failed to pay they could only come in with the other holders of debentures, and compel the company to wind up their affairs, if their assets should be insufficient to meet the claims against them. It had been said that if the clause relating to trustees should be struck out the whole bill would virtually be destroyed; then what inference could be drawn, except that it was a most objectionable measure.

The Duke of Mariborough said the principle of the bill seemed not to be well understood; the debentures which were proposed under the bill were of a general character: they must be under the seal of the company, and be signed by two directors. The securities to be offered by the companies would be threefold—first, the monies received in the shape of loans; next, the guarantee fund; and, lastly, the uncalled shares, amounting to half the nominal capital. It was a mistake to suppose that the profits would arise merely from the difference between the interest paid and received; it would include the receipts on the commissions on business. There would be no danger of improvident loans, as on half-built houses, as competent valuers would be employed, and the directors would be guided by them. The companies which availed themselves of this bill could not fairly be deemed of a speculative character, and the country was indebted to the noble lord the chairman of committees (Lord Redesdale), for the suggestion that the measure should be treated as a public and not a private one.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that for his own part he would not consent to any enactment which would alter the provisions of any existing trust. He had found in his judicial capacity that the greatest hardship arose from the limited nature of the powers conferred on trustees. Trustees naturally and properly were desirous to be safe; and they were averse to laying out their money, except upon securities expressly within the terms of the trust. With regard to companies under the present bill, the security offered had been correctly stated by the noble duke, but the security which would be offered to trustees investing would be of a novel character; no allotment would be made of any separate portion of the compound assets, and they would consequently have no direct or personal remedy. It was undoubtedly true that the debenture holder would have the security of half the nominal capital of the company. All that he could do would be to call upon the company to realise its property and to make an equal distribution amongst the debenture holders.

The Earl of Donoughmore said that there were great and increasing difficulties in the way of obtaining money upon the security of land on reasonable terms, in consequence of the many other ways in which money could now be invested, and therefore he thought that the clause which gave trustees the power to invest their funds in the improvement of lands was one of the most important in the bill.

After a few words from Lord Redesdale, the House went into committee on the bill.

Upon clause 32, which enables trustees who are authorised by the instruments respectively creating their trusts to lend or invest money on the security of land or real property, to invest money on debentures to be created under the proposed act.

Lord Portman said, that the clause enabled trustees to do that which they were positively forbidden to do by these settlements; and, therefore, he moved its rejection.

The Marquis of Bath seconded the motion.

Lord Cranworth suggested, that they might obviate all difficulty by making the clause prospective.

The Lord Chancellor suggested, that the clause be postponed, and a new one prepared in its stead.

The clause was accordingly struck out, and the bill passed through committee.

ECCLIASTICAL COURTS AND REGISTRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

The Archbishop of Armagh, in moving the second reading of this measure, explained its provisions. There were four principal objects sought to be accomplished; first, to reduce the twenty-six ecclesiastical courts and registries in Ireland to twelve; secondly, to improve and simplify the mode of procedure in the metropolitan and diocesan courts; thirdly, to reduce the twenty-six vicars-general to twelve; and, lastly, to provide that all appeals from the metropolitan courts in Ireland should no longer be made to the Court of Delegates, but be heard and determined by the Queen in Council. He proposed by this bill to have, in matters of doctrine and discipline, the same final court of appeal, whatever that court might happen to be, so that both churches, in this respect, might be dealt with as one and the same church.

The bill was then read a second time.

SUMMARY PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, this bill was read a second time.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

On the motion of Lord Stanley of Alderley, this bill was read a third time, and passed.

OYSTER FISHERIES.

The Marquis of Clanricarde moved for leave to lay on the table a bill on the subject of oyster fisheries. The bill was founded partly on the Irish act, as far as it had been found useful, and partly on a private bill passed by their Lordships. He had taken care to guard against any improper infringement either of the rights of individuals or of the Crown.

The bill was read a first time.

Friday, June 3.

THE CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS AND CHIMNEYS REGULATION BILL.

The Earl of Shaftesbury having moved that the House resolve itself into a committee on this bill, and after some debate, various clauses having been amended, and some struck out, the rest were agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be reported.

PENAL SERVITUDE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On a motion for going into committee on this bill, on clause 2,

Earl Grey proposed to add words, providing, that where a criminal had been convicted more than three times, the sentence should be a minimum punishment of seven years.

Earl Granville said, that a discretionary power was already vested in the judges.

Earl Grey said, that was true; but they exercised that discretion so leniently, that Parliament ought now to limit it. He had seen cases where criminals had been convicted fifteen times, and then a sentence of only three years' penal servitude was raised. That was a perfect mockery.

After some remarks from Lord Cranworth and Earl Granville, the clause as amended was then agreed to.

On clause 4,

Lord Houghton moved an amendment to omit certain words; the effect of which omission would be to do away with the system of registration. We ought not to invest the police of this country with the powers it was proposed to confer upon them by this bill, and to make it a misdemeanour for a discharged criminal not to report himself to the police.

After some debate,

Lord Houghton said, he was willing to modify his amendment in such a way as that the ticket-of-leave man should be required to report himself once a month.

Their Lordships then divided, and there were—

For the amendment	41
Against it	49

Majority 8

Lord Portman moved, that the requirement to report themselves personally should be restricted to male convicts.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS REFORM.

In answer to a question put by Mr. H. Seymour, Sir G. Grey said he had never said that he had prepared a bill of ecclesiastical reform, and that, after a correspondence with some of the prelates, he had yielded to their objections to the measure. Last year, in answer to the hon. gentleman, he had stated that the Lord Chancellor had prepared a bill in reference to those courts, but that, after a conference with some of the most distinguished prelates, he had found that there were great difficulties in the way of carrying such a measure, and great differences of opinion on the subject. The bill was, therefore, postponed. But with regard to ecclesiastical registries, he had authority to state that the Lord Chancellor would introduce a bill on that subject this session, and that he hoped to fulfil—he would not say his promise—but the expectations that such a bill would be introduced this session in the other House. He admitted it was not the duty of the Government to postpone any ecclesiastical reform out of deference to the objections of the prelates. At the same time it was desirable to obtain their consent, if possible, before introducing a general bill on the subject. He had no correspondence to produce, because none had passed between himself and any prelate on the subject. The communications between the Lord Chancellor and the prelates on the matter were verbal communications.

On the motion of Mr. P. Bouverie, the House went into committee to consider certain portions of the Act of Uniformity, according to which all fellows of colleges in Oxford and Cambridge were required to make a declaration of their conformity with the Church of England. It was proposed to repeal that requirement, and leave colleges themselves to make such provision in that respect as might seem best to them for the interests of the colleges and the universities.

Mr. Selwyn having made some remarks against the proposed measure,

The House went into committee, when a resolution was agreed to, and leave given to bring in a bill founded thereon to repeal certain portions of the Act of Uniformity relating to fellowships in Oxford and Cambridge.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—At the anniversary meeting recently held, Mr. George Denman, M. P., in the chair, the society proceeded to the election of officers for the ensuing year. The report of the auditors was read, which showed that the society numbered 130 members of the Bar, exclusive of honorary members; and that the finances were in a flourishing condition, there being a considerable surplus beyond all outgoings. The chairman delivered an address on the objects and prospects of the society, congratulating its members upon its prosperity, and urging their active co-operation in making known, and extending the sphere of, its usefulness.

On Monday evening last the society again met at its rooms in St. Martin's-place, Strand, to hear a paper read by Mr. Vernon Lushington, discussing the case of the so called "Southern Pirates" (Tirman and Others), recently argued before, and decided by, the Court of Queen's Bench. Mr. Edward James, Q. C., presided. Messrs. Westlake, W. M. Best, F. M. White, Charles Clark, and the chairman addressed the society, and Mr. Lushington spoke in reply.

SOCIAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.—A meeting of the Department of Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Law was held in the rooms of the association on Monday last, Lord Brougham in the chair, when the report of the standing committee on the County Courts Acts Amendment Bill was brought up. The report, which had been drawn with great care, described the provisions of the measure, and stated at some length the arguments on either side that apply thereto. It recommended the retention of a modified power of commitment by the county court judges, and considered the Lord Chancellor's proposal for a limitation of suits to one year too sudden and extreme a measure. The committee suggested a limitation of one year to sums not exceeding 40s., and of three years to sums not exceeding 20l. The report also referred to the fact that the department had, at a previous meeting, passed a resolution approving of the principle of conferring an equitable jurisdiction on the county courts, an object which would be to some extent carried into effect by the bill. A discussion on the report took place, in which Lord Brougham, Mr. Serjeant Pulling, Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Hastings, Mr. H. Robinson, Mr. Joseph Raynor, and other gentlemen took part, and a resolution was passed approving of the report.

Mr. R. J. Scott, Bengal Civil Service, has been appointed to officiate as a judge of the High Court of Judicature, Bengal.

The London Gazette contains a warrant, given at the Palace at Balmoral, on the 30th ult., containing new and additional regulations respecting the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Lancaster, and the three divisions into which it is now divided for the holding of assizes and sessions.

DEATH OF MR. NASSAU W. SENIOR.—We have to record the death of Mr. Nassau William Senior, late Master in Chancery and Professor of Political Economy at the University of Oxford. Mr. Senior having gone through the usual curriculum at Eton, entered at Magdalen College, where he graduated in 1811, taking a distinguished first class in classics. Amongst his college contemporaries were Sir John T. Coleridge, the Earl of Delawarr, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Provost of Oriel, the Dean of St. Paul's, and other gentlemen who have raised themselves to prominent positions in the learned professions and in literature.

In 1818 he was called to the bar, and in 1836 was appointed a Master in Chancery, during the Chancellorship of Lord Cottenham. In 1825 he was elected Professor of Political Economy at Oxford, being the first incumbent of the professorship which was founded in that year by the late Mr. Drummond, M.P. He resigned it in 1830, and was succeeded by the late Dr. Whateley, Archbishop of Dublin. In 1847 he was re-elected to the same office in succession to Dr. Travers Twiss. For some years he held the office of Examiner in Political Economy in the University of London. He has written many works on the science to the pursuit of which he devoted his life, and has contributed to the "Quarterly," "Edinburgh," and other reviews. Mr. Senior was seventy-three years of age.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 18, 1864.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR has brought forward another bill, the short title of which is, the "Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration, &c. Bill."

The &c., however, of Lord Westbury, like that of Littleton, commented upon with so much gravity by Lord Coke, comprehends much, and will, no doubt, take many by surprise who imagine that the short title to the bill is indicative by its principal contents.

The larger title of the bill does not much mend matters—it is, A Bill intituled "An Act to alter the Laws relating to the Remuneration of Attorneys and Solicitors, and to amend, in several Matters, the Law as administered in Courts of Equity."

This reminds us of a title to an old act, which, like the present, commenced by an alteration of the law relating to attorneys and solicitors, and ended with regulations as to the exportation of horned cattle.

Notwithstanding its title, the bill, although some of its clauses are open to doubt and criticism, contains some very excellent provisions. It is divided into four parts. The first part relates to the remuneration of attorneys and solicitors. The second part is termed "general provisions." Why, or wherefore, it is difficult to say. The third part relates to the administration of assets. And the fourth part gives power to make the Court of Chancery a trustee instead of private persons.

The preamble of the bill states, that the law which now regulates the remuneration of solicitors and attorneys-at-law by their clients, is inexpedient and unjust, and that it is expedient to amend the same.

Now, in order to put an end to this injustice, the bill provides, that an attorney or solicitor may enter into a contract with his client as to the manner, rate, or scale of his remuneration for his professional services, provided that such contract be reduced into writing, and signed by such attorney and client respectively, and duly attested by two or more credible witnesses (sect. 1).

Moreover, a solicitor appointed a trustee by any deed or will made after the 1st January, 1865, with the consent of his co-trustee or co-trustees, if any, may act as solicitor or attorney for the trust, and make professional charges, except where a certain remuneration is expressly provided under the trust for his professional services (sect. 2); and he may also take security for future costs or advances (sect. 3).

These provisions will require grave consideration before they ought to be passed into a law.

Although there is no doubt that, as a general rule, in ordinary cases, it is not advisable to interfere with any contract which any man may bonâ fide make with another, still there are exceptions to the rule, and we think it will be difficult to shew that the rules at present in force preventing an attorney from entering into contracts with his client as to costs, are not founded in sound policy and common sense.

There appear to be two strong objections to the alteration in the law proposed by this bill: the first is, that attorneys and solicitors are a limited class, enjoying a monopoly, who can, therefore, readily combine to raise the price or value of their labour; and, secondly, the persons they deal with, viz. their clients, cannot, in general, form any adequate or correct notion of the value of the labour which they contract for. The client, therefore, would be left entirely at the mercy of the attorney, and in most cases any contract he might enter into would be in the dark.

Again: whom is it intended to benefit by these clauses—the client or the attorney? If a benefit is intended for the client, it is, we think, one of a very doubtful character. If a benefit is intended for the attorney, can Parliament be induced to believe that attorneys and solicitors are, as a general rule, so underpaid under the existing system as to require legislative assistance to enable them to deal upon equal terms with their clients? We think not.

The present system of costs is by no means perfect, but we very much doubt whether the proposed alteration of the law will be beneficial—at any rate to the client.

With regard to the 2nd clause, we think that the existing rule, which prevents a solicitor from deriving a profit from his trust, ought not to be altered.

With regard to the second part of the bill—coming under the rather strange head of "general provisions"—it is proposed to abrogate that rule of equity which renders it incumbent upon the purchaser of a reversionary interest to shew that he has given the full value for it (sect. 4).

The present law relating to the sale of reversionary or expectant interests, no doubt operates sometimes with great harshness, and bonâ fide sales are set aside on very unsatisfactory evidence as to value, but at the same time it seems right that protection should be afforded to persons who sell reversionary interests against those who take advantage of their distress to obtain such interests at an undervalue. The law may, however, require some modification, according to which a sale should not be set aside, unless the price was a certain proportion, as, for instance, one-half, one-third, or one-fourth below the actual value.

The clause in the bill making a chose in action assignable at law seems unobjectionable (sect. 5).

The next clause provides, that persons to whom property is given by will (beneficially and not as trustees) as joint tenants, are to take as tenants in common, except where the intention to create a joint tenancy is otherwise expressly declared (sect. 6).

The next two sections relate to the equity of a married woman to a settlement. Sect. 7 provides, that where a feme covert married before the 1st January, 1865, files a bill for a settlement, the right of her children to settlement shall not be lost by her death before decree. We quite agree with what is proposed to be done by this section, but we think it ought not to be limited to women married before the 1st January, 1865.

Sect. 8 is as follows:—"The equity, or right in equity, of every woman married on or after the 1st January, 1865, to a settlement out of after-acquired property, whether real or personal, other than such right on equity as may arise by agreement or trust, express or implied, shall be and is hereby abolished."

We cannot believe that Parliament will act as unjustly to married women, as to take from them this valuable right to a settlement, without at any rate conferring upon them some other right not at present enjoyed by them over their own property as an equivalent.

The separate acknowledgment or examination of a married woman with respect to freeholds or copyholds, &c., of which she is seised as trustee, disposed of by her, with her husband's concurrence, in accordance with the trusts, is not to be necessary (sect. 9).

Part three of the bill, which relates to the administration of assets, provides, that the debts or demands of an executor or administrator against assets are not to have a preference over other debts or demands of the same degree (sect. 10). A judgment obtained against an executor or administrator by confession or collusion, is not to create any preference in the administration of assets (sect. 11). Creditors by statute, recognisance, or specialty, are not to have any preference over simple contract debtors in the administration of personal estate (sect. 12). Creditors by specialty, in which the heirs are bound, are not to have preference over creditors by specialty, in which the heirs are not bound, nor over simple contract creditors in the administration of real estate (sect. 13). Ecclesiastical dilapidations are to rank as simple contract debts (sect. 14).

Executors or administrators are to have full power notwithstanding anything in the will contained, to sell or convey, and mortgage, the real estate of the deceased for payment of debts, in the same manner as if it had been personalty; but the legal estate is not to vest, by virtue of the act, in such executors or administrators. A declaration in writing, under the hand of such executors or administrators, is to exonerate any real estate, the descent or devise of which shall be so assented to, from the power over the same thereby given to such executors or administrators, but not so as to prejudice any purchaser or mortgagee under the power aforesaid, without notice of such assent. But there is a proviso, that the power of sale or mortgage thereby given shall not be exercised without an order by an equity judge at chambers, an account being first taken of the personal estate of the deceased debtor, and of the debts and liabilities affecting the same (sect. 15). Next comes a clause saving the rights of the Crown, and the priorities of mortgages, &c., judgments, decrees, &c. (sect. 16).

All these provisions are most excellent; but we are inclined to think, that the Lord Chancellor might have ventured to dispense with the proviso to the 15th section, requiring the sanction of an equity judge to a sale or mortgage of real estate by an executor or administrator.

The fourth part of the bill enables persons, by deed or will, to settle personal property so as to vest the administration thereof in the High Court of Chancery in England or Ireland (sect. 17); the Court to make orders in respect thereof on petition, or summons without bill; or, if necessary, to direct the institution of a suit in respect thereof (sect. 18); and the Lord Chancellor, with the assistance of the Master of the Rolls, or one of the Vice-Chancellors, is to have power to make General Orders to carry the act into effect (sect. 19).

With regard to the bill as a whole, although there are many provisions in it which, if enacted, will very materially improve the law, there are some, especially those few clauses which relate to attorneys and solicitors, the policy of which is, to say the least against them, doubtful.

Why the bill should bear its present title it is difficult to conceive, for it must result in all persons who look only at the outside being completely mystified.

We may here call attention to the marginal notes of the bill, some of which are exceedingly inaccurate; take, for instance, the marginal note to sect. 4:—"Purchase bond fide made not set aside, though under full value," the object of the section being to render valid the purchase of reversionary interests.

Then, again, the marginal note of sect. 7 is, "Where a court of equity decrees a settlement, right to settlement not to fail by death of married woman." This is the law at present; the object, however, of the section is, to provide, that when a married woman has taken proceedings to enforce her equity to a settlement, the right of her children to a settlement shall not fail by her death before decree.

Again: sect. 9 will astonish most lawyers by the announcement, "Separate acknowledgment, &c. of married woman abolished;" whereas the clause proposes to abolish the separate acknowledgment only in cases where the woman is seised as a trustee.

Although there is much that is valuable in this bill, it is, we think, to be regretted that an end is not put to this piecemeal kind of legislation.

Our law will never be much improved until our legislators have courage to deal with its amendment on a larger scale.

The example set by the Indian Civil-law Commissioners is one that may well be followed by those in authority here. Suppose, for instance, a well-considered bill were brought before Parliament, embracing the whole subject of the administration of assets, would that not be much better than to thrust in a few sections upon that subject in a bill intitled—Heaven save the mark—"The Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration, &c. Bill?"

We can scarcely, however, suppose that a bill brought in at so late a period of the session is likely to pass; if it does not, however, it will still be useful, as laying before the public and Profession a measure containing many provisions which are of a highly beneficial character, and which, when arranged in a more scientific manner, may, we hope, become the law of the land.

INSTRUCTIONS TO GOVERNORS OF COLONIES AS TO PRIZES CAPTURED BY BELLIGERENTS.

THE war between the Federal and Confederate States of North America has called the attention of this country to several important questions of international law, having relation to our duties to the belligerents respectively in our rather novel state of neutrals in a maritime war.

The peculiar position of the Confederates, whose ports being all blockaded, have no place to which they can resort for the purpose of obtaining a regular condemnation of enemy's vessels taken as prizes, gave rise to the case of The Tusalooa, which put the Government of this country and the governor of the Cape in a very embarrassing position. The material facts of the case of The Tusalooa lie within a small compass.

Although ships of war belonging to each of the belligerent countries may come into our ports, her Ma-jury, in order to maintain her neutrality, issued an order to the effect that no uncondemned prize was to be brought into British waters.

On the 21st June Captain Semmes, in The Alabama, captured a merchant ship called The Conrad, belonging to the Federal States. Captain Semmes put on board the captured vessel two guns, ten men, and a lieutenant, and changed her name to The Tuscaloosa, and converted her, as he alleged, into a tender to The Alabama.

On her first visit to the Cape, The Tuscaloosa was treated as a tender; on her second visit she was treated as a prize, not bonâ fide converted into a public ship of war, and was seized by the governor of the Cape as having been brought into British waters in contravention of her Majesty's orders. The Tuscaloosa was afterwards restored to the Confederates, upon the ground that she was seized when under a safe conduct.

Her Majesty's Government, however, did not take upon themselves to decide, in this case, whether what had taken place had converted The Tuscaloosa into a ship of war, sailing under the flag of the Confederates.

In order to put an end to the difficulties which arose in the case of The Tuscaloosa, the following important instructions have been sent to governors of colonies by her Majesty's Government, respecting the treatment of prizes captured by Federal or Confederate cruisers if brought into British waters:—

"Downing-street, June 2, 1864.

"Sir,—I think it well to communicate to you the decisions at which her Majesty's Government have arrived on certain questions which have arisen respecting the treatment of prizes captured by Federal or Confederate cruisers if brought into British waters.

"1. If any prize captured by a ship of war of either of the belligerent powers shall be brought by the captors within her Majesty's jurisdiction, notice shall be given by the governor to the captors immediately to depart and remove such prize.

"2. A vessel which shall have been actually and bonâ fide converted into, and used as, a public vessel of war, shall not be deemed to be a prize within the meaning of these rules.

"3. If any prize shall be brought within her Majesty's jurisdiction through mere stress of weather, or other extreme and unavoidable necessity, the governor may allow for her removal such time as he may consider to be necessary.

"4. If any prize shall not be removed at the time prescribed to the captors by the governor, the governor may detain such prize until her Majesty's pleasure shall be made known.

"5. If any prize shall have been captured by any violation of the territory or territorial waters of her Majesty, the governor may detain such prize until her Majesty's pleasure shall be made known.

"Her Majesty's Government have not thought it necessary to make any addition to the instructions already given with respect to cargoes, viz. that her Majesty's orders apply as much to prize cargoes of every kind which may be brought by any armed ships or privateers of either belligerent into British waters as to the captured vessels themselves. They do not, however, apply to any articles which may have formed part of any such cargoes if brought within British jurisdiction, not by armed ships or privateers of either belligerent, but by other persons who may have acquired or may claim property in them by reason of any dealings with the captors.

"These rules are for the guidance of the executive authority, and are not intended to interfere in any way with the process of any court of justice.

"I have, &c.

(signed) "EDWARD CARDWELL."

According to these instructions, if a Confederate ship of war captures a merchant vessel belonging to the Federals, and converts and uses her as a public vessel of war, she may come into a British port, as not falling within the definition of a prize. The conversion, however, must be bonâ fide; it must not be made colourably, as, for instance, for the purpose of enabling the captors to dispose of the cargo of the captured ship, as was alleged to have been done by the captors of The Tuscaloosa. These instructions appear to be carefully and fairly drawn, and will, we think, answer the purposes for which they were framed.

WRITS REGISTRATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

AN attempt has recently been made on the part of the Lord Advocate of Scotland, by the Writs Registration (Scotland) Bill, to abolish local registers in Scotland, and to have one general register in Edinburgh. The advantages which the bill would confer on Scotland were stated by the Lord Advocate to be—first, the removal of the necessity of a double search; secondly, the economy that would result from the abolition of a separate staff of officers; and, lastly, and which is represented as perhaps the most important part of the whole, to enable the staff of officers in the register-house to keep the index of the registers up to the day, or at least as near the day, of registering as possible, so as to facilitate and cheapen the operation of searching.

It need scarcely be said, that the rest of Scotland, headed by the important town of Glasgow, vehemently and successfully opposed this attempt at centralisation. In an able paper written in opposition to the plan of the Lord Advocate it is said—

1. The first of these advantages can be attained simply by abolishing the general register, and keeping up the whole of the local registers, as proposed by the bill. The result, as it is truly stated, of this operation, would be, that there would then be only one register to examine.

It is not at all necessary for the attainment of this desirable end, that these local registers should be removed from their present localities to Edinburgh. The search can be made at least equally well in the locality as in Edinburgh. But it is self evident that, in point of fact, the search can be made more conveniently, more expeditiously, and more economically on the spot, than, were it necessary, to send to Edinburgh for that purpose.

2. As to the second advantage held out, viz. the economy that would result from the abolition of a separate staff of officers. It is difficult to see how this is to be accomplished. It is proposed by the bill to keep up, even in Edinburgh, a system of separate county registers, and each of these must necessarily be under the charge of an efficient staff of officers, who must all be adequately paid for discharging the very important duties of their office, in the same way as the local officers must be paid for discharging the like duties. But if all deeds were to be transmitted to Edinburgh, there must necessarily be some additional expense incurred for correspondence, and the extra trouble thereby occasioned, irrespective altogether of the delay and inconvenience resulting from all deeds having to be sent to Edinburgh.

3. In regard to the advantage—treated as being, perhaps, the most important part of the whole bill—of enabling the abridgment and indexes of the registers to be kept up to the day, or nearly to the day, of registering, this can be done without the slightest difficulty in the county where the deed is registered. At present the minutes are prepared in the counties by the local registrars; and, if so, it is manifest that the abridging and indexing, which are certainly not more difficult or important operations, can be performed equally well, and indeed better and more expeditiously, in the locality than in Edinburgh, where the officials must necessarily be strangers to, and ignorant alike of, the parties and the lands.

4. Were the general register abolished, as proposed by the bill, and the local county registers established as the only registers for land writs, and the abridgments and indexes made up and retained in the counties, it would be impossible to devise a more complete or simple and economical system of registration and searching.

Indeed, there seems to be no good reason why, as proposed by the bill, a separate register, either for adjudications or inhibitions, should be kept up. There can be objection to providing that these shall be recorded at once in the local register of writs, and in this way a complete record of the whole incumbrances affecting land would be kept in one register, thereby reducing the expense of a search to the lowest possible point.

5. It is a mistake to say that the change contemplated by the bill has been called for by the country. The necessity for abolishing the general register, and so getting quit of the double search, has been long acknowledged; but the whole of Scotland, with the exception perhaps of the metropolis, is nearly unanimous in condemning the proposal to remove the local registers to Edinburgh, as being wholly uncalled for, and as impeding, instead of facilitating, the operation of recording and searching.

In evidence of the preference given to the local registers, it may be here stated, that the Commissioners' Report shews, that the average number of writs annually recorded throughout Scotland is 14,405, of which only 3244 are recorded in the general register. The latter number includes all writs relating to lands in more than one county, which are at present recorded in the general register, and writs prepared by Edinburgh lawyers, for whom it possesses the facilities of a local register. With these deductions, the number of cases in which any other than Edinburgh practitioners prefer the general to the particular register is very small indeed.

The preference given by the public to the local registers is further shewn by the fact, that the increase in the number of writs recorded in those registers in 1860, as compared with 1848, was nearly 70 per cent., while the increase in the general register was only about 30 per cent.

What the majority of the inhabitants of Scotland want is, that the present system of local registration may be preserved, and further time may be given for maturing a plan embodying all practical improvements, without making these improvements dependent upon an inconvenient scheme of centralisation.

We are glad that the Advocate-General's bill has been defeated, and hope that in future, in England, all similar attempts at centralisation will be opposed as vigorously and as successfully.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, June 9.

REMUNERATION OF ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS.

The Lord Chancellor introduced a bill for the amendment of the law relating to the remuneration of attorneys and solicitors, and stated that if it were then read a first time, he would explain its provisions on the occasion of the second reading of the bill.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS AND CHIMNEY REGULATIONS BILL.

The report of the amendments of this bill was agreed to.

COURT OF JUSTICIARY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

The Lord Chancellor in moving the second reading of this bill, said that its object was to give the Queen in Council the same power of creating new assize towns in Scotland which she possessed in England. There was a further provision in the measure to the effect that the assizes should not be completely withdrawn from any town without the consent of Parliament.

After a few words from Lord Brougham, The bill was read a second time.

THE COUNTY COURTS.

The Earl of Derby asked the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack whether he had written to the registrars of the county courts on the subject of the bill now passing through their Lordships' House. The answer from the county court judges had been laid upon the table, but he understood that the registrars also had been required to report on the circumstances of the cases in which persons had been imprisoned for debt. He would be glad to know whether such reports had been received.

The Lord Chancellor said he had not given any instructions whatever that such returns should be asked for, but he was not quite sure but that his secretary might have written to some particular registrars requesting information on the subject. He would look through those reports which might have been received, and if they bore on this subject would lay them upon the table. Although he retained the opinion that the period of limitation in the case of debts under 20*l.* should be fixed at one year, still he was prepared, owing to the information which he had received that such a transition from the present period of limitation would be too great, to fix the limitation to three years in the first instance. He also thought that a bill of this description ought to be prospective, and not retrospective, and the three years should count from the time of incurring the last item of the debt, the last payment, or the last acknowledgment in writing of the debt.

Lord Chelmsford said the amendment proposed by the noble Lord was, subject to trifling variations, the same as he had been prepared to move when the bill was in committee.

THE REMOVAL OF THE WEST RIDING ASSIZE TOWN.

Lord Wharncliffe rose to move, that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that the late decision of the Privy Council, ordering the removal of the West Riding Assizes from York to Leeds, instead of to Wakefield, be reconsidered. Several commissions which had inquired into the subject were in favour of the removal to Wakefield, and not to Leeds. A population of 900,000 lived in Wakefield and its neighbourhood, and only 623,000 in Leeds or its neighbourhood. The prison and public offices were, moreover, at Wakefield.

Lord Houghton seconded the motion.

After some debate,

The Lord Chancellor said, that encouragement had been already given to Leeds to prepare to make arrangements for the administration of justice there. He earnestly hoped there would be no division; but if there were a division, he appealed to their Lordships not to place the Crown in the difficulty that would necessarily arise from a vote adverse to that of the House of Commons.

The House divided—

MORTGAGE DEBENTURES BILL.

On the order of the day for the consideration of the report on this bill,

The Earl of Malmesbury moved the insertion of a clause, to the effect that trustees who were empowered to invest trust money in real property should be allowed to invest it in mortgage debentures.

Lord Redesdale opposed what he regarded as so perilous a change.

Lord St. Leonards also expressed his disapproval of the clause.

Lord Cranworth moved the omission of the words from the clause "or the major part of them." As the clause stood he thought it would prove wholly inoperative.

The Earl of Malmesbury said he was much obliged to the noble and learned Lord for his suggestion. The object was to give every security possible. Under all the circumstances of the case he would assent to the amendment.

Lord Redesdale was strongly opposed to the clause, and was determined to divide the House upon it.

The clause as amended was negatived without a division.

The report was then agreed to.

UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Their Lordships went into committee upon this bill.

The clauses in this bill were agreed to, and it went through committee.

ECCLIESIASTICAL COURTS AND REGISTRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On the motion of the Archbishop of Armagh, their Lordships went into committee on this bill.

The Bishop of Oxford said his right rev. friend the Bishop of Exeter had given notice of a motion that a select committee be appointed to consider and report on the modes of appeal proposed in the 83rd, 84th, and 85th sections of the bill, but he had been unable to remain in the House until the discussion came on. He had become exhausted in his efforts to remain; but in consequence of the right rev. the Primate of Ireland having intimated his intention not to go on with these clauses to-night, he (the Bishop of Oxford) would not move the amendment of his right rev. brother, and would withdraw the amendment of which he himself had given notice.

The Earl of Belmore objected to any clause in the law affecting the Irish branch of the United Church which would not deal with it as it would with the English branch. Such a procedure would be contrary to the Act of the Union.

The 83rd, 84th, and 85th clauses were omitted, and the remaining clauses were agreed to.

The bill passed through committee.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL.

The amendments introduced into this bill were reported to the House.

THE SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CLERGY DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.

The amendments on this bill were also reported, and agreed to.

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, June 9.

COLLECTION OF TAXES BILL.

After some discussion, this bill was passed through committee.

WRITS REGISTRATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on the second reading,

Sir J. Fergusson moved that the bill, the object of which was to remove the local registers to Edinburgh, be read a second time that day three months.

After a debate, in which the measure was opposed by Scotch members with considerable warmth,

The Lord Advocate said, he believed that the measure would prove beneficial; but without more support than he had received, he could not look forward to its successful operation. He was bound to defer to the opinions adverse to the measure, which had been expressed in the course of the debate; and he had come, he owned most reluctantly, with regard to what he deemed a most important reform in the law of Scotland, to the opinion that a little more time was desirable for the consideration of the measure. He hoped that it would be considered, and considered on its merits. He moved that the order for the second reading be discharged.

Sir J. Fergusson withdrew his amendment, and the order of the day was discharged.

CHURCH BUILDING AND NEW PARISHES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion of The Attorney-General, the order for the second reading of this bill was discharged.

Friday, June 10.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE BILLS.

On the motion for going into supply,

Lord R. Cecil moved, "That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the duty of ascertaining the facts upon which legislation in respect to private bills is to proceed should be discharged by some tribunal external to the House."

After some debate, the motion was withdrawn.

Monday, June 13.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND ESTATES BILL.

Mr. Walpole asked the hon. member for Poole whether he proposed to proceed with the Church of England Estates Bill on Wednesday next, and if not, on what day.

Mr. H. Seymour said he had been informed since he had brought in that bill that the Home Secretary intended to introduce a similar one. He should, however, persevere with his bill, but he should not bring it on before Wednesday week.

UNIFORMITY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. Walpole asked the right hon. member for Kilmarnock whether he proposed to proceed on Tuesday evening with the Uniformity Act Amendment Bill; and if so, what was the latest hour at which that bill would be taken.

Mr. Bouverie said, he proposed to postpone it to the 21st instant.

RAILWAYS CONSTRUCTION FACILITIES BILL.

Mr. Whalley moved that the 9th clause be struck out.

Lord Galway moved that the chairman do report progress.

After some words from Mr. M. Gibson,

The question having been put, the chairman was ordered to report progress.

The House then resumed.

STREET MUSIC (METROPOLIS) BILL.

This bill was read a second time.

Tuesday, June 14.

THE FACTORY ACT EXTENSION BILL.

Mr. Bruce, in moving the second reading of this bill, said it had been introduced in consequence of the report of a commission which had been appointed by the late Sir G. C. Lewis to inquire into the employment of young children in factories. That commission inquired into the state of the children and young persons employed in lucifer-match making, the manufacture of percussion caps, and paper staining, pottery, and other trades, and they recommended that provision should be made that all places where those trades were carried on should be properly guarded, and effectually cleansed; that special means should be provided against danger; and that the provisions of the Factory Act should be applied to those trades.

After some debate, the bill was read a second time.

Lord Ingestrie said, he would not press a motion which he had made for referring the bill to a select committee.

THE YORKSHIRE ASSIZES.

Mr. S. Estcourt gave notice that he should on Monday next, on going into committee of supply, move an address to her Majesty, praying that the report of the Privy Council with regard to the transference of the assizes from York to Leeds should be reconsidered.

AUSTRALIA.—EXPULSION OF TICKET-OF-LEAVE MEN.

Mr. Blake asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether his attention had been drawn to the notice given by Mr. Kye, M. P. for East Melbourne, of his intention to move the following resolution in the Legislature of Victoria:—"To move that this House will resolve itself into a committee of the whole, to consider the propriety of presenting an address to his Excellency the Governor, requesting that the sum of 5000*l.* might be placed on an additional estimate for the purpose of defraying the expenses of exporting to Great Britain ticket-of-leave men during 1864, not exceeding 300 in number;" and, in the event (as appears to be generally anticipated in the colony) that the resolution should pass before the dispatch of the next mail, what course the Home Government are prepared to adopt.

Mr. Cardwell said, he had not received any official communication from Victoria even that the notice of the motion to which the hon. gentleman referred had been given. He was sure the hon. gentleman would not expect him to anticipate the adoption of such a resolution by the Legislature of Victoria, and still less to state what course it might be necessary for her Majesty's Government to take in the event of that resolution being adopted.

Wednesday, June 15.

FORFEITURE OF LANDS AND GOODS BILL.

Mr. C. Forster, in moving the second reading of this bill, said that he regretted the subject had not been dealt with at the time of the passing of the Criminal Acts Amendment Bill. The present law of forfeiture was unjust in principle, and had its origin in the barbarous enactments of feudal times. It had been repudiated in the Code Napoleon and other modern codes, and it was matter of surprise to most men that it had so long been allowed to remain on the English statute book. He did not apprehend there would be any difficulty, if the bill became law, in the matter of compensation to certain corporations who had claims to the goods of convicted felons. As the crime of treason was of rare occurrence, he had not included in the bill cases of attainder, but had limited it to ordinary cases of felony. He hoped the House would bear in mind the anomalous distinction between felony and misdemeanor. Felony was followed by forfeiture, but misdemeanor was not, though misdemeanor comprehended offences of a more injurious nature than the large majority of cases of felony that came before the courts. A labourer stole a lump of coal, and because his offence came under the head of felony, he was told that all his goods and chattels were forfeited to the Crown, though his punishment in other respects was but nominal; while the banker who was convicted a few years ago, and whose frauds had been the ruin of some persons, was told that his case was a misdemeanor, and was not punishable by forfeiture of his goods. We advocated the repeal of the law of forfeiture on the ground that the punishment inflicted by a criminal court ought to be adequate to the offence, and no more. He might allude to the case of Kirwan, convicted at Dublin, in 1852, of murder. The evidence was not deemed conclusive to warrant his execution. His sentence was commuted into one of banishment, and the whole of his property was confiscated to the Treasury, although there were persons who had the strongest claims to it. If the House wanted a further proof of the injustice of this law, he would refer them to the report of Wilkin, appended to a return relating to certain criminal statistics made to the House on the motion of the hon. member for Dumfriesshire (Mr. W. Swart). The House would perceive, that in respect to this law of forfeiture, the Treasury was placed in the very undignified position of an official assignee to the convict's estate, collector of his debts, and then paying the net receipts into the Consolidated Fund. If the law was so administered with regard to the really guilty, let the House consider what its effect was upon the innocent. He believed that the House had never comprehended the vast amount of injustice and oppression that were practised under this law, or they would never have permitted its existence so long. It was well known that the practice generally was amongst innocent persons charged with serious offences, involving forfeiture, to transfer their property to a third party, in order to save it if possible for their families in the event of an adverse verdict, and he believed it was by no means an uncommon thing for the party to whom the property had been thus conveyed in trust, to claim an absolute right over such property, even after the acquittal of the accused. Having mentioned several cases of extreme hardship and injustice under this law, the hon. gentleman called attention to the case of Mr. Bewicke, which would be remembered as a lasting monument of suffering innocence and grievous oppression. He said that, considering the many just and humane modifications which had been of late years made in our criminal law, he could not but entertain the most sanguine anticipations that the British Parliament would not refuse to abolish the law of a barbarous age, and to place our criminal jurisprudence upon a footing more consonant and in harmony with that humane and enlightened legislation which had of recent years characterised its proceedings.

Mr. W. Ewart seconded the motion.

Mr. Hunt opposed the bill, and said, that if the hon. member had proposed a select committee to consider what alteration of the law was necessary, he would have voted with him. But the bill as it stood was a crude piece of legislation, incapable of being put into a satisfactory shape, and he, therefore, moved that it be read a second time that day three months.

After some debate, the amendment was withdrawn, and the bill was read a second time.

COSTS SECURITY BILL.

Mr. Butt moved the second reading of this bill. He said, that at present an Englishman suing a person in the Irish courts was obliged to give security for costs, and the same thing was required of an Irishman suing an Englishman in the English courts. This was much complained of by the mercantile community. He proposed by the bill that an Englishman should be able to sue in the Irish courts on the same terms as he sued in the English courts, and that an Irishman should have the power of suing in the English courts upon the same terms as he sued in the courts in Ireland.

Mr. Whitelaw moved that the bill be read a second time that day three months.

After some debate, the House divided, and the numbers were—

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH POOR LAWS, 1864.

THE Annual Report of the Commissioners for administering the Laws for the Relief of the Poor in Ireland has just been delivered.

There seems from the Report to be a laudable desire, both on the part of the commissioners and of the guardians of unions, to avoid unnecessary expenditure in litigation.

In the Appendix to the Report is a copy of a manual prepared under the authority of the commissioners, for the purpose of enabling the guardians of unions to deal more readily with the questions of chargeability on electoral divisions, which often come before them in the execution of their duty. "The appeal," say the commissioners in the Report, p. 11, "against the decisions of the board of guardians in these cases, is subject to our assent; and although we have never refused such assent when pressed for by the parties competent to appeal, no such appeal has ever gone to trial in the course of the twenty years during which this part of the poor law has been in operation." The guardians of unions being desirous to avoid the expense of litigation, have taken advantage of the condition attached, as above mentioned, to the privilege of appeal, to apply to the central office for advice in all doubtful and difficult cases, and thus far a very unsatisfactory description of poor-law expenditure has, so far, been avoided. The present publication (the manual) gives at one view all the provisions bearing on the chargeability of electoral divisions, which are scattered through the original Irish Poor-law Act, and the Amendment Acts; and is followed by a selection from the precedents accumulated since the passing of the act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 92, which gives the right of appeal.

SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GENERAL BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS IN LUNACY FOR SCOTLAND.

THIS Report seems on the whole to be satisfactory, and to prove that some improvement has taken place in Scotland in the treatment of the insane.

The Report, however, shews that, with regard to single patients, much still remains to be done. Further powers should be given to the commissioners; and where patients, kept in private houses, are treated with positive cruelty, or with neglect amounting to cruelty, the persons so treating them should be punished by the law, if it can reach them; or if it cannot, an act ought to be passed similar to the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 95, under which Samuel Porter was indicted and convicted at the last Cornwall Assizes, for the wilful neglect of his lunatic brother.

The commissioners say, that they have from time to time experienced considerable difficulty in removing to asylums pauper lunatics whom they did not consider fit patients for private dwellings, from the hesitation of parochial medical officers to grant the necessary certificates of insanity. They consider, however, that this hesitation arises more generally from an imperfect knowledge of insanity, and an incorrect appreciation by these officers of their duties, than from any wish improperly to impede the removal of the patients. (P. xxiv).

The commissioners, moreover, state that a considerable degree of unwillingness exists among the parochial authorities, more especially in country parishes, to place their pauper lunatics in asylums, from the fear of their detention being unnecessarily prolonged; and for this reason, among others, they consider it extremely desirable that measures should be adopted for bringing the mental condition of patients in asylums periodically under view, for the purpose of determining in what cases removal to private dwellings might be properly undertaken. (P. xxvi).

It seems, moreover, that where single patients are not under the sheriff's order, and not in receipt of parochial relief, the commissioners have little or no authority to interfere; nor even in cases of gross ill-usage of lunatics by those who have care of them, do they appear to have power, or, at any rate, inclination, to direct proceedings to be taken for their punishment. Thus, the commissioners say, "Although our statutory powers do not authorise us to visit single patients who are not under the sheriff's order, and not in receipt of parochial relief, we have abundant proof that the condition of such patients is very frequently most deplorable, especially in families which are little removed above pauperism. In cases of this kind we have frequently succeeded in introducing an improvement, by prevailing on the parochial board to place the patients on the poor roll; but in others, all our efforts to improve their condition have, from various causes, failed. The amount of wretchedness to which such patients are subjected can only be fully realised by personal inspection."

The following, amongst other cases, is printed in the Report:—"A. C.—By no description can I convey to the board an idea of the filth, discomfort, and disorder of the room in which this man passes his life. In the sense of being completely neglected, he is positively ill-used, or treated with cruelty. His sister promises immediate amendment, and requests I should call again before leaving the county, to be able to report the changes."

The commissioners observe, that it seems to have been the intention of the Legislature that the sheriff should have authority to interfere in such cases, on being made cognisant of their existence by the board, and that he should have power of ordering removal to an asylum. But as the act authorises this procedure only when the patient has "been detained beyond the period of a year after the malady had become apparent and confirmed, and when it has been such as to require, during any part of that period, coercion or restraint," it is evident that removal could be enforced in only a very small proportion of cases.

Again: "Although, by sect. 41 of the Lunacy Act, it is enacted, that no lunatic shall be kept in any private house, unless such house shall be the dwelling-place or temporary private lodging of such lunatic, the commissioners have abundant evidence, that a large number of lunatics are boarded out illegally."

The commissioners say that, as they had no knowledge that patients so detained were cruelly or harshly treated, they decided, in our opinion improperly, to take no further steps in the matter.

We cannot but think, that the law in such cases ought to be strictly carried out; that laxity on the part of the commissioners in enforcing its provisions, will lead to many abuses, or rather will allow the continuance of abuses of long standing, which by more energetic conduct on their part might be suppressed.

With regard to establishments for the reception of lunatics, the commissioners call attention to the power which the law is understood to place in the hands of the person at whose instance a patient has been sent to an asylum. Until recovered, he cannot be removed without the concurrence of this person, and from him the superintendent takes his instructions as to what visitors shall be admitted. It is obvious that great powers, capable of great abuse, are thus lodged in the hands of the person at whose instance the patient is confined. (P. xxxii).

This evil seems, to a certain extent, to be provided for by the 47th clause of the Lunacy Act, requiring a refusal of admission to a patient to be transmitted to the board; but this clause does not appear to be effectual to prevent the evils mentioned by the commissioners.

Another evil to which the commissioners allude is as follows:—"The statute permits, that one of two medical certificates on which a patient is placed in an asylum, and also the certificate of emergency, on which he may be detained for three days without the sheriff's order, may be granted by the superintendent of the asylum into which he is admitted, if not a private asylum. By this provision, only one extraneous medical certificate is required for the permanent detention of a patient in any public district or parochial asylum; and a certificate of emergency, granted by the superintendent of any such asylum, is sufficient authority for detaining a patient under his own care for three days.

The first of these provisions the commissioners consider to be objectionable, not because it involves any great risk of the confinement of a sane person as a lunatic, but because it places the superintendent in a false position in relation to his patients, on many of whom, the knowledge that they are detained under the certificate of the superintendent, in whose care they are placed, cannot fail to exercise a deleterious influence.

There is some risk, too, that the superintendent may be warped in his judgment of the case, by having committed himself to an expression of opinion before he had an opportunity of carefully studying its features. (P. xxxiii).

The power of probationary discharge of patients, under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 54, s. 16, has been found of great service, by promoting the discharge of doubtful cases, and facilitating the recourse to change of scene. (Ib).

The Report contains some interesting observations on the lunatics in establishments, in public, private, and parochial asylums, on the lunatic wards of poor houses, and on dangerous, criminal, and alien, lunatics.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.—Monday, June 6, 1864.—The Right Hon. Lord Brougham in the chair. The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed. A letter was read from Mr. Pitt Taylor, calling attention to his observations appended to the Report of the Royal Commissioners on the State of the County Courts (1855). The Report of the Standing Committee on the County Courts Acts Amendment Bill was read. Moved by Mr. Henry Wordsworth, seconded by Mr. Serjeant Pulling—"That the Report now read be received and entered on the minutes, and be circulated among the members." After a discussion, in which Mr. Henry Robinson, Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Rayner, Mr. Palmer, Mr. Burch Rosher, Mr. Hastings, and the Chairman took part, the resolution was put and carried. A memorial addressed to the Lord Chancellor on the subject of the Bankruptcy Law was, on the motion of Mr. Hastings, referred to the standing committee of the department for their consideration. The meeting then adjourned.

The annual meeting of the Department of Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Law will be held at the rooms of the society, 3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall, S.W., on Monday next, the 20th inst., when the Report of the standing committee on the proceedings during the year will be presented. Lord Brougham will take the chair at eight o'clock.

The annual dinner of the department is fixed to take place on Saturday, the 2nd July. Members intending to be present are requested to give their names to the assistant secretary.

SUMMARY OF THE REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE OF JURISPRUDENCE AND AMENDMENT OF THE LAW, ON THE COUNTY COURTS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—The Standing Committee of Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Law has made a valuable Report on the County Courts Acts Amendment Bill, of which the following is a short summary:—

As to the 17th section, which provides that no action shall be brought for ale or beer when drunk on the premises, the committee observe that the policy of this provision can scarcely be doubted.

The committee observe, that the consideration of two important portions of this bill—the limitation to a period of one year of actions for sums not exceeding 20*l.*, and the abrogation of the power of the county court judges to commit to prison for default in satisfying a judgment, the defendant having had means of payment, must depend in a great measure on the question whether it is advisable that facilities should be given to the working classes for obtaining credit. There is no doubt that there are other classes who would be more or less affected by these proposed enactments; but, in the main, it is to that large portion of our population which subsists by weekly wages that they would practically apply.

Upon this general question of credit, the committee offer no decided opinion; but they wish to point out, that if it were thought desirable to abolish credit, the bill does not go far enough, and that the enactment proposed by Mr. Sheriff Hallard (purposing to abolish all actions for the necessities of life where the amount of each transaction is under 20*s.*), or that suggested by Lord Cranworth, of abolishing all actions under 3*l.*, would be much more effective; whereas, if it be desirable that the working man should be able to obtain credit—or, in other words, to give security to his creditor—then the bill goes too far, by abolishing what seems to be the only sure means of obtaining payment.

A perusal of the answers given by the sixty county court judges to the Lord Chancellor, will shew their almost unanimous opinion of the necessity for retaining the present power of imprisonment. The judges bear testimony to the moderation and mercy generally shewn by the creditor; and that the harsher provisions of the law were abolished by an act passed some years since at the instance of the present Solicitor-General^o. These considerations will probably lead to the conclusion, that this power of imprisonment is a weapon equally merciful, cheap, and efficient for the maintenance of justice in small debt courts, operating as it does over a wide area of indebtedness, by a very small amount of actual bodily suffering.

The committee entertain grave doubts whether this proposed attachment of wages would ever be tolerated by employers, or be effectual against the dishonest debtor; and they are strengthened in their doubts by their knowledge of the strong feeling which exists in Scotland against a somewhat similar system, long in force in that part of the kingdom. They would suggest, that it might be advisable to obtain by means of a select committee, from employers of labour and others, some definite information upon the subject.

The insolvency part of the bill seems to be based on the same equitable principle, of a rateable division of the property of an insolvent debtor among all his creditors, as has been established with regard to the upper and middle classes; and to this principle no objection, in theory at least, can be urged. It must, however, be borne in mind, that legislation, which is just for one class, is often inapplicable to another; and it may be doubted whether facile insolvency is wholly equitable towards the creditors of a class who virtually are without assets, extremely prone to run into debt, and, as the figures alluded to in the Report testify, seem to have a natural opposition to spontaneity of payment.

With regard to that part of the bill which relates to the limitation of suits, the committee fear that a reduction of the period to one year for sums not exceeding 20*l.*, is too sudden and extreme a measure.

The department has already passed a resolution, approving of the principle of conferring an equitable jurisdiction on the county courts, and the committee have only to observe, that this object will be to some extent carried into effect by the bill. It may be questioned, however, whether the power of granting an injunction should not have been added.

With regard to sects 34 to 39 inclusive of the bill, the committee observe, that it has been stated that in undefended causes, where the debtor resided at a distance, the proceedings in the superior courts are cheaper, and, at the same time, far more efficacious and expeditious than in the county courts. In the face of these statements, the committee certainly think it undesirable that so sweeping a provision should be introduced as a mere incidental accessory to a portion of this bill.

REFORMATORY AND REFUGE UNION.—On Thursday evening a conversation was held at the society's rooms, in Suffolk-street, Pall-mall East, in furtherance of the objects promoted by the Discharged Prisoners' Relief Committee; the Earl of Shaftesbury, K.G., in the chair. Amongst the company present were—Earl Ducie; Lord Ebury; Sir Walter Crofton, C.B.; Mr. Hanbury, M.P.; W. R. Bodkin, Esq.; Mr. and Mrs. Beamish Baker; Rev. S. Hornbrook; Colonel Colville; Captain Brookes; Rev. J. and Mrs. Owen; Mr. G. H. Oliphant Ferguson; Colonel and Mrs. Edwards; Mr. Robert Baxter; Rev. Sir Nicholas and Lady Chinnery; Lady Anna Maria and the Misses Tellerbach; Mr. and Lady Isabella Whitbread; and Colonel Henderson, the director of county prisons of Ireland, &c. Specimens of prisoners' work in the Corkin-street prison were displayed in one of the ante-rooms. The object of the society is to relieve criminals on their discharge from prison. Mr. T. L. Murray Browne, the hon. secretary to the Discharged Prisoners' Relief Committee, made a detailed statement to the company, from which it appeared that the committee commenced its operations in the beginning of March, and from that time to the end of April they had received from the county of Middlesex 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* in "star money," to which the prisoners were entitled for good conduct. They had also received an additional grant from the same source, amounting to 50*l.* 7*s.*, and the total expended on prisoners, including star money, was 44*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* The number of prisoners placed under the care of the committee in the two months was seventy. Of this seventy no less than fifty-four had obtained employment, whilst the others were not to be regarded as cases in which the efforts of the committee had been unsuccessful. Indeed, the number was small where the committee had been unable to obtain employment for prisoners, though in some instances obstacles presented themselves which the committee could not control. Of the fifty-four for whom the committee had found employment, twelve had been sent to sea, while the remainder were put to various trades. The expenses incurred were almost confined to those of the agent; the printing was done in the prison itself. The company was addressed by Sir Walter Crofton, C.B., Colonel Henderson, Lord Ebury, &c., and a resolution was passed to the effect, that the success which has attended the recent efforts to relieve criminals on their discharge from prison, under the authority of the Discharged Prisoners Aid Act of 1862, proves that it is possible, both as regards employers and the men themselves, to restore such persons to honest life, and warrants the extension throughout the country of the plans pursued in London; and this meeting trusts that the committee of the Reformatory and Refuge Union, under whose auspices the work has been carried on, will take steps for the establishment of relief committees in connexion with the various borough and county gaols. The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the noble chairman.

The magistrates of Middlesex had a meeting on Tuesday last, Mr. Pownall presiding, when Mr. Serjeant Payne moved, and Mr. Harwood seconded, that the magistrates should petition Parliament against the Prisons Bill, now before the House of Commons, on the ground that it would empower the Secretary of State to appoint Roman Catholic chaplains to the gaols against the wish of the magistrates. Considerably more than one-tenth of the Profits is derived from Policies which do not participate in the Profits, so that THE ASSURED HAVE LARGER BONUSES THAN IF THEY FORMED A MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, and received the whole of the Profits derived from their own Policies.

The last BONUS averaged about SIXTY PER CENT. on the Premiums paid, and TWO PER CENT. PER ANNUM on the Sums assured.

The EXPENSES of Management are less than FIVE PER CENT. on the Income.

The PREMIUMS are calculated for every half-year of age.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 25, 1864.

THE current of judicial decisions has long flowed against deeds of arrangement, but there are now indications of its setting strongly in the opposite direction. Within the last few weeks five of these deeds have been held to be good, whilst the tone and manner of the Courts have altogether changed with regard to their treatment; and the judges are now as astute to ignore, as they formerly were to discover, faults in these deeds.

It is not necessary, or perhaps advisable, to speculate here on the why or the wherefore of this metamorphosis of the judicial mind: changes as sudden have heretofore occurred and may recur again; but it may be permitted to us now to inquire whether it would not have been much better if more attention had been bestowed upon the predictions in 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 49, of the flood of litigation that would, as we then saw, ensue, and that has actually, though uselessly, followed the ill-drawn arrangement clauses of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861.

It may be useful now again to take up at the point where we then left off—our consideration of the decisions on this branch of the law, in order that our readers may determine for themselves whether this reaction in the judicial mind of which we have above spoken, will suffice to reconcile and bring into harmonious working the antagonistic sentiments and interests of the legal and commercial world in these matters, or whether a still more direct and definite interposition of the Legislature may not be needed before deeds of arrangement secure to creditors all that the framers of the last Bankruptcy Act promised to them.

When we formerly wrote, Walker v. Adcock (8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 519) and Foot v. Wood (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 178) had been only just decided. In the former, a "cessio bonorum" was held indispensable; and in the latter, a clause providing for the indemnity of the debtor from any liability on bills of exchange—a clause which the creditors had thought reasonable, but which the judges thought unreasonable, was held altogether to invalidate one of these deeds. These two cases have been the archetypes of numerous subsequent decisions, although Walker v. Adcock has been less followed than Foot v. Wood. Indeed, in the case of Clapham v. Atkinson (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 358), two judges of the Queen's Bench, Mellor and Blackburn, preferred to hold with Lord Justice Turner in Ex parte Rawlins (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1183), that a deed that did not contain any cessio bonorum might be perfectly good and valid; and only on last Tuesday the Exchequer Chamber affirmed the judgment. Unreasonable covenants, however, have been found in abundance; and in Inglebach v. Nichols (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1015); Nicholson v. Potts (4 N. R. 71; 10 Law T., N. S., 192); and Balden v. Pell (10 Law T., N. S., 493; S. C., 4 Weekly Rep. 186), the unreasonable covenant was the same as in Foot v. Wood. It is true, that in Nicholson v. Potts, Willes, J., suggested, that for "unreasonable" the word "unequal" ought to be substituted, but the appositeness of the suggestion, as regarded the covenant then before the Court, is not very evident. In Leigh v. Pendlebury (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 296) clauses, that creditors might be required to verify their debts, or lose their composition, and that creditors whose debts were less than 10*l.* should be paid in full, were held unreasonable covenants. In Dell v. King (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 427), a covenant that any creditor suing for a debt comprised in the deed should forfeit it, was held unreasonable; and it was stated by the Court in their judgment, that the debtor had no right to make his creditors enter into any covenants; and a clause, declaring that covenants contrary to the statute should be considered inoperative, was held to be itself nugatory. In Dewhurst v. Kershaw (1 H. & C. 726); Copeman v. Hart (14 C. B., N. S., 91); and Armitage v. Baker (10 Law T., N. S., 526), clauses requiring creditors to assent within a certain time, on pain of forfeiture of their debts, or of being deemed to assent, were held unreasonable. In Hidson v. Barclay (4 N. R. 340; 12 Weekly Rep. 883), covenants that creditors should not negotiate bills without indorsing thereon a memorandum of their assent to the deed, that the partners and executors of the creditors should not sue the debtor, and that anything in the deed not authorised by the statute should be obligatory only on those who executed the deed, were all held unreasonable.

On the other hand, in Strickland v. De Mattos (10 Law T., N. S., 59), clauses providing for the payment of the costs of deeds and inspectors prior to dividends, for the verification of their debts by the creditors, for setting apart dividends to accumulate, and for the abrogation of all provisions that might be considered at variance with the Bankruptcy Act, were all held reasonable. In Dewhurst v. Jones (12 Weekly Rep. 885; 10 Law T., N. S., 538), an absolute unconditional release of debts, in consideration of a covenant by a stranger (to whom the debtor's property had been assigned) to pay a composition, was held perfectly reasonable. So, in Stons v. Jellicoe (12 Weekly Rep. 922), a composition deed, by which the debtor covenanted with a trustee, and not with his creditors, to pay him for seven years a certain sum quarterly, for the benefit of the creditors, was held to be reasonable.

It will be observed, that in Strickland v. De Mattos, two clauses were held reasonable which in former cases had been held to be unreasonable, so that uniformity of decision, with a view to which questions of reasonableness have usually been left to a judge rather than to a jury, has not in these cases been yet reached. What is reasonable in fact or law is certainly not always confided to the most reasonable tribunal; gross negligence in an attorney is a question for the jury, whilst reasonable cause for arrest is left to the judge; and we are not sure, notwithstanding the opinion of Abbott, C. J., in Smith v. Doe d. Jersey (2 Br. & B. 592), that courts of law are the proper judges of reasonable clauses in deeds of arrangement. Baron Bramwell's account (given in Hidson v. Barclay, ubi sup.) of the origin of this jurisdiction, such as it is, is as follows:—"The Exchequer Chamber, in Walter v. Adcock, has decided, that if the covenants and provisions in the deed be such as it would be unreasonable to require a creditor to assent to, a non-assenting creditor is not affected by it. By this, and many decisions following on it, we are also bound. There is no express provision in the statute to warrant this decision, and the power given to, or assumed by, the Court, ought to be cautiously exercised. It may be, nothing should be said to be unreasonable which is not 'ultra vires,' i. e. 'not relating to the debts or liabilities of the debtor, nor his release therefrom, nor to distribution, inspection, or winding up of his estate.' It may be, that in all matters within their competency, the creditors are sole judges." We shall have a word or two to remark on this hereafter.

Another head of objection to these deeds of arrangement has been, that they have not been framed for the equal benefit of all the creditors. Thus, in Berbridge v. Abbott (13 C. B., N. S., 507) and Ilderton v. Castrique (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 994), deeds to which the undersigned creditors only were made parties, were held bad; and in Dingwall v. Edwards (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 387) and Ex parte Cockburn, re Smith (Id. 573), deeds by which assenting creditors had a cash composition paid them on their execution of the deed, were held void against dissenting creditors, who would only get the covenant to pay the composition, and would, therefore, not have the same advantage as the others. On the other hand, in Wells v. Hacon (12 Weekly Rep. 790; 4 N. R. 99), extra advantages conferred upon a surety for the debtor were held not to invalidate the deed; for the Court "could not help seeing" (as they said) "that such an arrangement might be beneficial to all the creditors."

Some collateral points have also been litigated respecting these deeds; as, for instance, the manner of reckoning up the debts so as to arrive at the requisite majority, and the method of taking advantage of them, i. e. whether by plea or by application for protection from execution. And it has been decided that, in estimating the amount, both secured and unsecured debts must be taken into consideration (King v. Randall, 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 207); whilst the presence or absence of a release indicates whether the deed may be pleaded, or can only be used to avert execution. (Whitehead v. Porter, 12 Weekly Rep. 742; Ipsstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson, 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 428; Eyre v. Archer, 12 Weekly Rep. 916).

The decisions in equity on this subject, with one exception, have been omitted in this article; but apart from them, it is abundantly evident that the arrangement clauses in the act of 1861 have been more profitable as yet to lawyers than to creditors, and the irresistible question that now forces itself upon our notice is, whether, without some further alteration in the statute law, the same state of things will not continue, and whether good faith has been kept, or ought to be kept, in this matter with the commercial community. As we have seen, it does seem to have occurred to some of the judges, that creditors were by this statute endued with larger powers than before, and one judge even could imagine that they might have a discretion to prefer one of their own body above the rest; but still the exercise of their discretion is to be subject to the review of the Court, and only to be allowed where the Court are of opinion that the discretion has been reasonably exercised.

Now, we are not concerned here to argue that creditors must be better judges than the courts of law and equity of the terms to be made with their debtor, and that the principle of a majority binding a minority involves of necessity an equal submission to the terms, when made, on the part of the assenting and dissenting creditors, so that the latter cannot, any more than the former, be allowed to object (save on the ground of fraud) to any of those terms; but we do say, that these were points assumed by the promoters, if not by the framers, of the act of 1861. No one can be familiar with the circumstances under which that act was brought forward, or the language used in and out of Parliament before it was passed, without acknowledging these facts; and if after all "quod voluit non dixit" is the result, there ought to be fresh legislation. The principles for which the commercial community have all along contended are, that creditors should be allowed to make their own bargain with the debtor, and that the majority should bind the minority, however unequal, unfair, or unreasonable the minority might think the bargain was, and that recourse should only be had to the law to enforce the bargain. These principles may be right or wrong, but they have never yet had their trial, and it has been promised that they should be tried; and this is all that we are at present concerned with.

Reviews.

A Manual of Forms of Procedure in Chancery, embracing chiefly the Provisions of the General Rules and Orders of the Court. By THOMAS W. BRAITHEWAITE, of the Record and Writ Clerks' Office.
[London: Edward Cox, 102, Chancery-lane, 1864.]

The object of this Manual, which appears to be very carefully and accurately compiled, is to facilitate the determination of all points as to the times of procedure in Chancery, now very numerous, and constantly arising in practice.

The author has adopted the form of a lexicon or dictionary, arranging the information upon the various subjects coming within the scope of his work, under convenient leading headings, with numerous cross-headings, for the purpose of facilitating search. Numerous useful notes are added, connected with the rules prescribing the times of procedure.

We think that the work will be of great assistance to practitioners.

A Treatise on the Fishery Laws of the United Kingdom, including the Laws of Angling. By JAMES PATERSON, Esq., M.A., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.
[M'Millan & Co.]

MR. PATERSON has done good service to the Profession, and, indeed, to all who are interested in fisheries and fishing, by the publication of this book. The subject is one which is yearly increasing in importance, and one which, as the author remarks in his Preface, has been hitherto prevalent among lawyers for "its confusion." The book treats of the several heads of fisheries and of fishing, and gives a compact and well-digested account of the law (common and statute) relating to each kind, and in force in Scotland and Ireland as well as in England. With respect to the property in poached fish, Mr. Paterson seems to be of opinion that it belongs to the poacher, the rule of law in such a case differing from that which prevails as to game killed on the land where it is started. Without expressing any confident opinion on the point, we do not see on what ground (looking at it as a matter of principle) the distinction rests.

The contemplative disciple of Isaac Walton will learn from this book that Isaac neglects to teach him that he is, as a general rule, a trespasser and a poacher. Innocent as he may think himself and his loved occupation, he is in fact perpetually exposing himself to penalties, to actions, and to the seizure of his rod and tackle. Anglers are, generally speaking, such quiet inoffensive characters, that landowners overlook their little trespasses, and consider them almost ornamental; but we think they should make themselves acquainted with the liabilities which Mr. Paterson's Chapter on Angling explains to them.

The book contains an excellent analytical table of contents, and a most carefully compiled index. Great labour and care have evidently been bestowed by the learned author on all parts of the work, and the result is, that an able, useful, and well-written book has been produced.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON LAW REPORTING,

Appointed at the Meeting of the Bar, held in Lincoln's Inn Hall on Wednesday, the 2nd December, 1863.

WE are informed that the following Report has been made by the Bar Committee, and that the scheme which they have prepared will be taken into consideration at a meeting of the Bar appointed by the Attorney-General, to be held on the 1st July next, at Lincoln's Inn Hall:—

The committee thus appointed were intrusted with the duty of preparing a plan for the amendment of the present system of preparing, editing, and publishing reports of judicial decisions, and were requested to report thereon to a future meeting of the Bar.

The committee have, after much discussion and deliberation, prepared the scheme hereinafter set forth, and they recommend the same for adoption.

The committee abstain from discussing in this Report the merits of the scheme, but confine themselves to a general statement of their proceedings.

The first step taken by the committee was to apply to the Benchers of Lincoln's-inn for the use of a convenient room in the new hall and buildings for the purpose of their meetings. This application was willingly acceded to by the Bench, and the committee have accordingly held their meetings in the Benchers' Reading Room at Lincoln's-inn.

At the first meeting of the committee, held on the 22nd December, 1863, they unanimously appointed Richard Paul Amphlett, Esq., Q. C., the permanent chairman of the committee. They have since held twenty-two meetings, and Mr. Amphlett has presided over every one.

At their first meeting the committee also accepted the services of Mr. James Thomas Hopwood, of Lincoln's-inn, as honorary secretary. The duties of the secretary having increased and become onerous, the committee shortly afterwards accepted the services of Mr. William Dundas Gardner, of Lincoln's-inn, and those two gentlemen have ever since acted as joint secretaries, and have been unsparing of their time and labour in rendering valuable services and assistance to the committee.

Before entering upon the consideration of any scheme of amendment to be suggested by any of its members, the committee resolved to issue a circular to the Profession, inviting observations and suggestions; such circular was as follows:—

"The committee are anxious, in order the better to discharge the duty intrusted to them, to collect the opinion of the Profession upon the subject of Law Reporting; and for that purpose the committee are desirous of receiving any observations which you, either alone or in conjunction with others, may be so obliging as to make upon what, in your opinion, are the advantages or disadvantages of the present system; and also any suggestions, either as to the principle or details, of any amendment of the existing system which you may think desirable."

This circular was sent to the judges, and extensively distributed among both branches of the Profession. In reply, the committee received numerous and valuable observations and suggestions. Although these exhibited differences of opinion as to the proper mode of amending the existing system of law reporting, they exhibited at the same time a very general desire for amendment; and the committee have been greatly assisted in the discharge of their duties by the observations and suggestions thus received.

The committee, also, before entering upon the consideration of any plan of their own, appointed a sub-committee (consisting of the Hon. George Denman, Mr. Serjeant Pulling, Mr. Henry Matthews, Mr. Quain, and Mr. Westlake) to inquire into the mode of recording and reporting judicial decisions in the various European States, and in the United States of America.

The sub-committee undertook these duties, and reported as follows:—

"The sub-committee thus appointed have received valuable communications from a number of competent foreign jurists, and other gentlemen professionally or officially connected with the chief tribunals of the countries embraced in the inquiry, and thus conversant with the subject-matter of the reference.

"The sub-committee have by this means obtained information which they recommend to the committee as worthy of their attention.

"To begin with the system adopted in France. Every judicial decision is required to be in writing, and to be motivé, i. e. to disclose on the face of it the grounds and reasons on which it is founded; and when the signature of the President of the Tribunal has been affixed to these solemn judgments, it is the business of the greffier to see them entered on the register of the courts, and only one version of them can therefore ever legally appear.

"The records of the tribunals thus containing an authentic version of every decision, the legal profession and the public have at all times access to the register to ascertain what has from time to time been decided, and it is competent for any one to make from the register a selection of such decisions for publication. The collections of decisions by Sirey and Dalloz, and Ledru Rollin, have been thus prepared. Though these works are deservedly held in great esteem, they are not official publications, any more than any series of English law reports.

"In Norway and Sweden the judgments of the ordinary tribunals are always given in writing, and in every case entered on the protocols of the courts; and in the supreme courts of appeal, when the votes of the judges are given separately, it is the business of the registrar of the court to enter on the records of the court, not only the final judgment or conclusion, but the grounds and reasons of the decision of each judge. Here, as in France, therefore, the records of the courts supply ample materials for the preparation of books of reports or collections of decisions, and such publications are left wholly to free trade.

"In Denmark, though it is competent for any one to take down, print, and publish reports of cases and decisions of which he has himself taken notes, the only authentic version of judicial proceedings is the entry in the dombistocol, under the hand of the judge, containing not only the conclusion itself to which the Court has arrived, but the facts and reasons and grounds of the decision; and from these, selections of cases which may serve for precedents are made by the direction of the Courts, though it would seem that other selections made by competent private publishers would be received with equal attention.

"In Italy all judicial decisions, whether civil or criminal, must be read aloud in open court, with the grounds in fact or law set out at length; and authentic minutes of the judicial opinions so pronounced are duly entered in the register of the court; and compilations of the principal decisions of the four Superior Courts of Cassation at Milan, Florence, Naples, and Palermo are published by voluntary editors, whose province it is to make a proper selection of cases for publication, to give an analysis of them in the head and marginal notes, and to explain or illustrate them in other annotations. These compilations only so far receive the protection of the State that a certain number of copies are subscribed for out of the public treasury. The compilation entitled 'La Legge Romana' is a journal of judicial and administrative proceedings for the kingdom of Italy, published at short intervals (the judicial three times a week), and containing in an abridged form notes taken from the minutes in the registers of all the important cases disposed of.

"In the United States of America there is no law requiring either written decisions or a record or register of the grounds and reasons of the decisions; but the judgments are generally in writing, and in most of the States, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, there are now official reporters, remunerated by salary as well as by a portion of the profits of the publications. These reporters are generally appointed by the State, and are always removable at the discretion of the appointing power, but enjoy in the performance of their duties the same freedom as the authors of our own law reports. In the Superior Court of the city of New York, the judges publish the reports of their own decisions, choosing an editor from among themselves. As a rule, the official reports omit the arguments of counsel, and give only a narrative of the facts and the copy of the written judgments. The official publication rarely appears for many months after the judgment is pronounced, and until that time publications called the Law Reporter and Law Journal are referred to, but do not profess to give more than the most important cases. No suggestion is made that the official reporters are less efficient or more dilatory than their predecessors under the voluntary system, nor is it found that they are subject to any improper influence in the discharge of their duties; and in the State of New York the official reports are required by law to be sold at a much smaller price."

The committee, with the information they now had before them, proceeded to consider proposals for amendment.

The first proposal discussed by the committee was a joint proposal by Mr. Serjeant Pulling, Mr. Joshua Williams, and Mr. Westlake, and was as follows:—

"The present system has arisen from the default of proper records of their own proceedings being kept by the Courts. The privilege which the Bar has of reporting comes to this, that any barrister may inform the Court of that which the Court might much better know from its own records. No remedy appears to us sufficient which does not strike at the root of the evil. It would be desirable that all judgments should be written; but this may be thought impracticable. We therefore propose as follows:—

"It should be the duty of the registrar, in all cases in which judicial opinions are pronounced, to record the names of the parties and of their counsel and attorneys or solicitors, the authorities cited, the judicial opinion or opinions delivered, and the formal judgment, order, or decree; also the substance of the pleadings and the case, and the points relied upon by counsel, wherever a mere transcript of the judicial opinions actually delivered did not render any other summary of the case, pleading, and points unnecessary.

"Each registrar should be assisted by one or more short-hand writers, whose duty it should be to take down all remarks of the judges, especially their judgments, and any remarks by counsel which may be necessary to render them intelligible.

"The short-hand writers should be allowed to furnish notes to applicants for their own profit.

"The short-hand writers' notes should be written out as soon as possible, and furnished to the registrar.

"It should be the duty of the registrar, from these notes and his own, with the assistance of the judges, the other officers of the court, and the counsel and attorneys or solicitors employed, to prepare such record of the case as aforesaid.

"This record should be printed as soon as possible by the Queen's printers, on paper of a given shape, each cause being on separate paper, and the transactions of each day being printed within a week at furthest.

"The records so printed should be published and sold at a low price, with liberty to any person to reprint them.

"The record so made should be amended by the Court, on sufficient evidence of its inaccuracy, and should be evidence in the same manner as the records of the courts now are.

"All printed pleadings and evidence should be on paper of the same size and shape with that of the records, so that the printed documents relating to each cause might be bound up, as those relating to Privy Council causes now are in Lincoln's-inn library; and copies of all such printed documents should be furnished to the libraries of the Inns of Court and the Incorporated Law Society.

"If a ministry of justice should be established, which we think very desirable, it might be charged with the preparation of an annual or semi-annual digest, and with supplying marginal notes to the record of cases, but so that such records might also be bought without such notes by those who might think it important to get them sooner."

After discussion, this proposal was negatived.

Mr. Montague E. Smith, Q. C., moved a resolution as follows:—

"That the committee recommend the principle of official reporters, such reporters to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and to be paid by the State; the reports to be sold under the authority of Government, compensation being afforded to existing interests."

The discussion upon this resolution was, with the consent of Mr. Smith, postponed until it should be seen whether any scheme of amendment would be sanctioned by the committee which should not be based upon Government patronage and control.

Several proposals, in various forms, but each founded upon the principle of establishing a system of reporting under the regulation and control of the Bar, were next laid before the committee; these formed the basis of the scheme adopted. Mr. Smith's motion was, therefore, not pressed.

Mr. Dickinson moved a resolution embodying a principle applicable to any set of reports to be so established, as follows:—

"That no case reported by reporters, under such supervision and control, should be quoted from any other report, but this not to interfere with the quotation from any other report of cases not already so reported."

This resolution was negatived; the committee considering that such a restriction, although in the opinion of several of the members very desirable, should not form part of the scheme.

The following is the scheme respectfully submitted and recommended by the committee for adoption by the Bar:—

SCHEME OF REPORTING RECOMMENDED BY THE COMMITTEE.

1. The reports recommended by this committee shall be placed under the general management and control of a council composed of members to be appointed as follows:—Two by Lincoln's-inn; two by the Middle Temple; two by the Inner Temple; one by Gray's-inn; one by Serjeants'-inn; and two by the Incorporated Law Society; and, in the event hereinafter mentioned, two more to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor. The council shall include also the Attorney and Solicitor General and the Queen's Advocate for the time being as ex officio members.

2. One of the members appointed by Lincoln's-inn, the Middle Temple, the Inner Temple, and the Incorporated Law Society respectively, and one of the members (if any) appointed by the Lord Chancellor, shall retire at the end of every two years, and the members appointed by Gray's-inn and Serjeants'-inn respectively shall each retire at the end of four years from his appointment, except that, for the purpose of equalising the number retiring periodically, the first member appointed by Gray's-inn shall retire at the end of two years. All members retiring shall be eligible for re-appointment.

3. Any occasional vacancy in the council by death, resignation, or otherwise, may be filled up by a new appointment, and the member so appointed shall retire at the time when the member occasioning the vacancy would in ordinary course have retired.

4. It is desirable that the council be incorporated by Act of Parliament or charter. The council shall have the assistance of a paid secretary, and the Inns of Court shall be requested to guarantee the payment of such secretary's salary, and the office and other expenses of the council (not exceeding together 500*l.* per annum), in the proportions following, viz.:—

Lincoln's-inn	.	.	.	Two-sevenths.
Inner Temple	.	.	.	Two-sevenths.
Middle Temple	.	.	.	Two-sevenths.
Gray's-inn	.	.	.	One-seventh.

5. The reports shall be prepared by reporters under the supervision of editors, and the cases to be reported shall be carefully selected upon the principle of rejecting all cases useless as precedents, and the copyright shall be vested in the council, or in trustees to be named by them.

6. The reports shall be divided into three series, viz.:—

1. Appellate, being the House of Lords and Privy Council cases;
2. Equity, including bankruptcy and lunacy cases;
3. Common law, including probate, matrimonial, admiralty, and ecclesiastical cases:

with such sub-divisions (if any) of each series as the council may think desirable.

7. The common law and equity reports shall be published in monthly parts respectively, and the appellate reports as often as shall be found convenient. The November parts shall comprise, as far as practicable, every decision not before reported up to the rising of the courts for the long vacation.

8. The council shall have power, if they should find it desirable, to establish, in connexion with the permanent reports above mentioned, a weekly set of reports.

9. The staff of editors and reporters, and their salaries, shall be as follows:—

Two Editors	each at £600 — £1200
Reporters—
2 House of Lords
1 Privy Council
3 Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices (including Bankruptcy and Lunacy)
2 Queen's Bench (including Appeals therefrom, to Exchequer Chamber)
8				each at £500 — £4000
2 Rolls
2 Vice-Chancellor Kindersley
2 Vice-Chancellor Stuart
2 Vice-Chancellor Wood
2 Common Pleas (including Appeals therefrom to Exchequer Chamber)
2 Exchequer do. do.
12				each at £400 — £4800
1 Crown Cases Reserved	100
1 Admiralty and Ecclesiastical	100
2 Probate and Matrimonial				each at £250 — 500
				2)£10,700
First moiety, see Rule 10	£5350

10. One moiety of these salaries (hereinafter referred to as the "first moiety") shall be paid in all events, by equal quarterly payments, to the editors and reporters; and the other, or "second moiety," at the end of each year, out of the profits of that year, so far as the same may be sufficient for the purpose: provided that the salaries or emoluments received by the House of Lords' reporters from the House shall be brought into account, and taken in part payment, of the salaries hereinbefore provided for them.

11. The editors and reporters shall be barristers, and shall be appointed and removable by the council; but the appointment of the reporters in each court shall be subject to the approval of the chief or presiding judge.

12. The existing authorised reporters shall have the offer of the first appointments in their respective courts, and in other appointments of reporters a preference may, if the council think fit, be given to the reporters of any publication which may be discontinued in consequence of the issue of the reports recommended by the committee.

13. Where there is at present a single authorised reporter in any court, to which two reporters are to be appointed under this scheme, the council may, on his accepting an appointment as one of such reporters, assign to him a proportion greater than one-half, but not exceeding three-fourths, of the aggregate salaries allotted to that court; and the claim of any authorised reporter, who is now entitled to a greater share of the emoluments of reporting than a colleague in the same court, to have an unequal division of the salaries allotted to the same court shall, in like manner, be equitably adjusted by the council: provided, that in neither of the cases contemplated by this clause shall a reporter be entitled to receive, in any year, more than the average annual amount of his receipts for reporting for the three years next preceding his appointment as a reporter under this scheme, until his colleague, or all his colleagues if more than one, shall have been put upon an equality with him.

14. Where there are now two authorised reporters in any court, to which one only is proposed to be appointed under this scheme, and both wish to be continued, the council may, if it thinks fit, appoint them both, and direct the salary allotted to the reporter of that court to be divided between them.

15. Subject to rule 11, the editors and reporters shall be appointed for a term of five years, and they shall be eligible for re-appointment; but this limit of time shall not extend to such of the present authorised reporters as may accept appointments as reporters under this scheme.

16. The particular duties of the editors and reporters shall be prescribed by the council, who shall have full power to increase or diminish the numbers engaged, vary their duties, and adjust or alter their salaries, regard being had to existing interests for the time being, under rule 9.

17. No restriction shall be placed upon the right of either editors or reporters to practise; but it must be a fundamental requirement that the duties, whether of editors or reporters, be faithfully and punctually discharged.

18. The judges of the several courts shall be requested to appropriate convenient places to be occupied by the reporters, to allow the reporters access to all such papers as they can control, and their written judgments, and to revise the reports of their unwritten judgments before publication.

19. The Bar and the solicitors shall be requested to afford the editors and reporters all the assistance in their power for the better discharge of their duties by communicating information, and permitting the use of briefs and papers and short-hand writers' notes.

20. The Profession shall be invited to subscribe to the reports at the following scale of prices, payable in advance, viz.—

	Per Annum.
For the entire Set . . .	£5 5 0
For the Common-law Series . . .	3 3 0
For the Equity Series . . .	3 3 0
For the Appellate Series . . .	2 2 0

And for any subdivision which the council may think fit to make, at such prices as the council shall determine.

21. Such invitations shall contain an announcement that it is considered essential for carrying out the scheme that the aggregate amount of subscriptions, inclusive of any advance from the Consolidated or Sutors' Fund, in respect to the first moiety of the salaries or otherwise, shall reach 10,000*l.* at least.

22. If such subscriptions, inclusive as aforesaid, shall fall short of 10,000*l.*, the subscription list may be cancelled, and fresh invitations issued for subscriptions at increased prices, not exceeding double the above scale.

23. The prices to non-subscribers shall be one-third more than those charged to subscribers.

24. The Government shall be supplied with as many copies of the reports as they may require for public purposes at subscribers' prices.

25. Authority shall, if possible, be obtained for the payment out of the Consolidated or the Sutors' Fund of the first moiety of the salaries of the editors and reporters, the same to be repaid out of the price of the copies supplied to the Government; and so far as that may be insufficient, out of the proceeds of the sale of the reports, as hereinafter mentioned. In case such authority is obtained, the Lord Chancellor shall have the appointment of two additional members of the council, as mentioned in rule 1.

26. The council shall have power to make such arrangements as will lead to the discontinuance of any set of existing reports, and for discharging the consideration for the same by payments, during a limited period, out of profits, but not in priority to the payments directed to be made by articles 1, 2, and 3 of rule 29.

27. The council shall contract with one or more publishers or printers, who shall undertake all the trouble and risk of the publication, sale, and distribution of the reports, receive the subscriptions, pay all expenses, and account to the council quarterly; such accounts to be examined and audited by the council, with such assistance as they may require.

28. In case payment of the first moiety of the salaries shall not be obtained out of the Consolidated or Sutors' Fund, it shall be made a term of the contract with the publishers or printers that they shall pay such moiety by equal quarterly payments, and be reimbursed the same out of the proceeds of the sale of reports, as hereinafter mentioned.

29. The proceeds of the sale of reports, and other profits therefrom, shall be applied as follows:—

1. In defraying the expenses of the publication, sale, and distribution, including the commission or other remuneration agreed to be given to the publishers or printers, and the first moiety of the salaries, if paid by them;
2. In payment or (if previously paid under the guarantee) in reimbursement to the Inns of Court of the secretary's salary and other expenses of the council;
3. In making good to the Consolidated or Sutors' Fund (if paid thereout) so much of the first moiety of the salaries of the editors and reporters as shall not be covered by the price of the copies of reports supplied to the Government;
4. In payment of the second moiety of the salaries of the editors and reporters; and of the consideration, if any, agreed to be given for the discontinuance of any existing reports under rule 26, in such order and priority as the council shall have arranged.

Lastly. In augmenting the salaries of the editors and reporters, or such of them, if any, as the council shall consider proper to be augmented, or in constituting a reserve fund to meet future contingencies, or in such other way as the council, in their discretion, shall consider best calculated to improve the system of reporting.

30. The council shall have power, so far as they may not be fettered by any subsisting engagement, to alter the price of the reports as they may think desirable, whether the several objects to which the proceeds of the sales are hereinbefore directed to be applied, or any of them, have or have not been fulfilled.

31. The accounts shall be audited yearly by an auditor to be appointed by the editors and reporters, and, subject to such audit, the council shall ascertain and settle the amount payable to the editors and reporters in respect of their salaries.

32. The council shall prepare and publish annually a financial statement and report of the results of the working of the system.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, June 16.

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS BILL.

This bill was passed through committee.

IMPROVEMENT OF LAND ACT (1864) BILL.

On the order of the day for the House resolving itself into committee on this bill,

Lord St. Leonards said, he regarded the bill as one of a very hazardous description.

Lord Portman and the Earl of Malmesbury spoke in favour of the bill.

The Lord Chancellor said, the provisions of this bill had been discussed with the greatest care by the select committee, and he believed that it would, when enacted, be of the greatest advantage to the country.

Earl Grey spoke in support of the bill.

The bill then passed through committee.

On bringing up the report, Lord Redesdale said, he had proposed in the select committee that this bill should be compulsory on all companies, and he regretted that the proposition was not adopted by the committee.

The bill was then reported.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURE BILL.

This bill was read a third time, and passed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL.

After some debate, this bill was read a third time, and passed.

SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CLERGY.—REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES BILL.

On the motion of the Duke of Buccleuch, this bill was read a third time, and passed.

Friday, June 17.

ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY RESPECTING THE WEST RIDING ASSIZE TOWN.

Lord Sydney (Lord Chamberlain) read the following reply of her Majesty to the address praying that the late decision of the Privy Council ordering the removal of the West Riding assize from York to Leeds, instead of Wakefield, might be reconsidered:—"I have to inform you, that, in pursuance of the provision of the act passed in the 3 & 4 Will. 4, an order was made by me, with the advice of my Privy Council, on the 10th inst., ordering and directing that assizes for the West Riding of Yorkshire shall be held at Leeds, and the 6th day of August has been since fixed by my judges of assize for the Midland Circuit for holding the next assize for the West Riding in that town. I have directed that a copy of this order shall be laid before you. If it should hereafter appear that, with a view to the more cheap, speedy, and effectual administration of justice, it may be expedient to appoint some other place for holding an assize in the West Riding, the subject shall be again referred for the consideration and advice of my Privy Council."

COUNTY COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The Lord Chancellor announced, that, for various reasons, he would postpone the further consideration of this bill during the present session, but he hoped that next session a similar measure might be reintroduced.

CHURCH SERVICES (APOCRYPHA) BILL.

After some discussion, the order for the second reading of this bill was discharged.

PENAL SERVITUDE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On the question that the reports of the amendments to the bill be received; on clause 4,

The Earl of Lichfield moved an amendment, dispensing with the necessity of a person sentenced to penal servitude to report himself once a month to the police, and requiring him to do so only when required by the conditions of his license.

The Earl of Carnarvon thought, that if the amendment were adopted it would amount to a reversal of the decision which their Lordships arrived at the other night, for by the amendment the Secretary of State would be empowered to sweep away every condition, and to dispense with supervision if he should think fit. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) should, however, be willing to insert a provision, that after the first appearance of a ticket-of-leave man, his future attendance to report himself might be dispensed with.

After a few words from Earl Granville, the House divided—

For the amendment	44
Against	36
Majority	—8

Some other amendments were agreed to, and the report was received.

The reports of amendments in the Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland) Bill, the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Bill, and the Improvement of Land Act (1864) Bill, were brought up and received.

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS BILL.

This bill was read a third time, and passed.

Tuesday, June 21.

ATTORNEYS' AND SOLICITORS' REMUNERATION, &c., BILL.

The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading of this bill, which he considered to be one of great importance. It contained a number of provisions upon points relating to the subject in question, which it appeared to him ought to be included in a measure of this kind. The principal and most important feature of the measure was that which related to the present mode of remunerating attorneys and solicitors. He believed that that mode of remunerating this most necessary and honourable order of professional men lay at the root of the many abuses connected with the operation of the law. That mode of remuneration was prescribed without any reference whatever to the skill, ability, industry, or judgment of the particular individual acting as attorney or solicitor. The skilled practitioner was paid precisely at the same rate as the ignorant or unskilled. The mode of remuneration recognised by the law led to all evils arising from great prolixity, unnecessary verbosity, and the multiplication of words and phrases. The attorney or solicitor felt himself placed in such a position that in order to obtain the ordinary reward for his time and labour he was obliged to transact his business upon this principle. Take the case of an attorney engaged to prepare the draft of a deed. Adopting a great number of forms and the ordinary common-places in law, he would probably prepare a deed that would extend to 200 folios, at a cost to the client of ten guineas. But supposing he used great care and judgment, and reduced the deed to 100 folios, by avoiding the usual prolixity and verbosity, he found that his reward was only five guineas. Then, again, by a greater exercise of his judgment, supposing that he reduced the length of the deed to fifty folios, his remuneration would only amount to two-and-a-half guineas—a sum by no means adequate to the great professional skill which he had exercised in the preparation of this document. In all cases attorneys were compelled to charge for useless services in order that they might be paid for the useful services they rendered. The evils which had resulted from this system were now considerable. In the pleadings counts were unnecessarily multiplied, and very considerable expenses were involved. These difficulties had existed for a long period of time; but, as was usual in matters connected with English law, even after the abuses had been pointed out, they were allowed to remain for nearly half a century before the matter was brought to an issue, and an attempt was made to remove them. He meant that this bill should apply to the whole range of business that was transacted by attorneys, and he was convinced that, by the provisions of the bill, the business would be done in less time, with a greater amount of certainty, and with greater skill than at present. He proposed, that where solicitors could enter into contracts with their clients they should do so, and also that they should take security from their clients for the payment of costs. After giving a summary of the other clauses of the bill, the noble and learned Lord concluded by moving the second reading of the bill.

Lord Brougham thought it would be dangerous to permit professional men becoming trustees to charge the estate with their professional bills, but, on the whole, he was inclined to think the bill would prove highly useful.

Lord St. Leonards spoke at some length against the bill, and said it struck at the true interests both of attorneys and clients, and as it was most dangerous in principle, he should give it his hearty opposition.

Lord Chelmsford said, remembering the speech which his noble friend delivered last session as to the mode of framing acts of Parliament, he was surprised that such a bill as this should have come from his noble friend's hands. The bill contained subjects of great importance, utterly unconnected with each other, so that it was quite impossible to grasp any one principle of the bill, as each division gave rise to separate discussion. He should think that his noble and learned friend had taken as his pattern a bill upon which he had stumbled, and which was passed in the reign of George II., intitled "An act to continue several laws for preventing exactions by the occupiers of locks and weirs on the river Thames westward—for ascertaining the rates of water carriage on the said river—for continuing and explaining the several laws for the better regulation of attorneys and solicitors—for regulating the price and assize of bread—for preventing the spreading of distemper amongst horned cattle—also to make further regulations respecting attorney and solicitor, and for further preventing distemper in horned cattle—for more frequently returning writs in the county palatine of Lancaster—for ascertaining the levying of writs of execation, and for allowing Quakers to make affirmation in cases where an oath was required." That bill had an advantage over the bill of his noble friend, for it fully explained its object. From what his noble and learned friend said some time ago, with regard to the inducements of conveyancers to make long deeds, he thought the bill would apply to that subject; but the bill was to enable all attorneys and solicitors, in every case, to enter into agreements with their clients to receive a sum of money, so as to escape the necessity of taxation of the bill of costs, as provided for by a recent act of Parliament—a power which he (Lord Chelmsford) thought was a preventive to oppression and extortion. He decidedly objected to that clause as it stood. The next clause was a little inconsistent, for his noble and learned friend had spoken of the family solicitor as the Old Man of the Sea, in the story of "Sinbad the Sailor." He (Lord Chelmsford) thought their Lordships would rather look upon him as the confidential friend and adviser. Now, his noble and learned friend proposed to place this Old Man of the Sea more firmly on the shoulders of his clients, by enabling him to be a trustee, and charge his costs. It was, however, impossible to discuss these clauses on that occasion, and the bill ought to be sent to a select committee. His noble friend some time ago had caused considerable pain to the great body of solicitors, by stating that the ill success of the Land Transfer Act was attributable in some degree to the solicitors having thwarted its object by preventing their clients taking advantage of it. He was sure that his noble and learned friend did not intend that his observations should extend to the profession at large, because the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, consisting of 800 members, petitioned in favour of the bill. Of course, there were instances in which solicitors had prevented their clients taking advantage of the act; but he was perfectly sure, from what he knew of the solicitors generally, that they were far too honourable to sacrifice the interests of their clients to their own selfish advantage.

After some remarks from Lord Cranworth,

The Lord Chancellor said that he had never thought of opposing the suggestion, that the bill should be referred to a select committee; and he mentioned, that as to the proposal in reference to the remuneration of solicitors, the Law Society approved of it, except in this, that they did not think that the precaution of having an agreement in writing would be necessary.

The bill was read a second time, and ordered to be referred to a select committee.

VACATING OF SEATS (HOUSE OF COMMONS) BILL.

This bill was read a second time.

THIRD READINGS.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed:—Penal Servitude Acts Amendment Bill; Union Assessment Committee Act; Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland) Bill; Chain Cables and Anchors Bill; Improvement of Land Act (1864) Bill; Naval Prize Acts Repeal Bill; and Banking Co-partnerships Bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, June 16.

REGISTRATION OF TITLES (IRELAND).

Mr. Waldron asked the Attorney-General for Ireland if the bill for the registration of titles in Ireland would be introduced before the end of the session.

Mr. Scully inquired, if the bill would not be introduced this session, whether the Government would consider the propriety of appointing a royal commission.

The Attorney-General for Ireland said a bill for the transfer of land in Ireland was in preparation. Immediately after the discussion of the question, a short time since, it was commenced, and he hoped it would be ready for introduction on an early day. He did not anticipate the necessity of a commission, as he was confident he should be able to introduce the bill this session.

Friday, June 17.

FACTORY ACTS EXTENSION BILL.

On the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a committee on this bill, clauses 1 to 7 inclusive were adopted.

After some discussion, the chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Monday week.

THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS.

On the motion for going into committee of supply, Mr. Ferrand (who spoke at great length) rose to move for a select committee to inquire into the construction, the expense, and the working of the Board of Charity Commissioners. There were no less than forty members connected with this board, every one of whom, without a single exception, belonged to the Whig party. There had been grievous complaints for a length of time made against this Charity Board. By various bills introduced into this House during the last few days of two or three sessions of Parliament, the board had become possessed of the most unconstitutional powers. The commissioners and the inspectors were clothed with judicial powers. When a Government stood before Parliament for the purpose of inducing them to agree to a measure of this important description, the Lord Chancellor of that day said, that "the board were to consist of three commissioners, one secretary, and two legal gentlemen of high attainments, upon whom, of course, the more laborious part of the business would devolve, to be inspectors, who were to go into the country, and bring justice home to the doors of the different charities." He also stated that "the total expense would probably not be more than 5000*l.* or 6000*l.* a year, and that it should be paid out of the public exchequer." The expense of the board during the past year, however, amounted to no less than 18,250*l.* Earl Russell had stated that the appointments ought to be made irrespective of all party considerations. But on the 22nd October, 1853, Mr. Peter Erle, a Whig, was appointed chief commissioner, at a salary of 1500*l.*; Mr. James Hill, a Whig, was appointed at a salary of 1200*l.*; and the Rev. R. Jones, another Whig, was appointed, with the same amount of salary. Mr. Henry Morgan Vane was appointed an inspector, with a salary of 800*l.*; Mr. Hare was appointed an inspector, with a salary of 800*l.*; and Mr. Skirrow, jun., was also appointed an inspector, with a salary of 800*l.* He had known that gentleman from his boyhood, and did not believe there was a more honourable man, and understood that but for him the board would come to a stand-still. He now came to the act of 1855, under which Mr. Campbell, Q. C., was appointed permanent commissioner, with a salary of 1200*l.* a year, in direct violation of a pledge which had been given to Parliament. He now came to the three inspectors—the men whose assistance was absolutely necessary in August, 1855, but who were not appointed until April, 1856. There was a strong opinion in many parts of the country that Mr. Martin had grossly failed in the performance of his duty. Mr. Bowles, the second inspector, had been the electioneering agent in the previous year of the private secretary of the present Prime Minister of England. Now, was he a fit man to be appointed an inspector, when a pledge had been given that party feeling was not to be mixed up with the appointment to the board? He now came to the third appointment, that of Mr. John Simons, who was declared by the right hon. member for Calne to be "a gentleman who has not been brought up, as far as I am aware, to anything." The gentleman referred to was not Mr. John Simons; he was Mr. John Simons, jun.—an uneducated man. He could write indifferently, but he could not spell. This person was clothed with judicial powers. Now, who was Mr. John Simons, jun.? In the year 1853 Mr. John Simons, jun. was a coal and potato dealer. At the end of that year he fled from his creditors to Australia. It was decided that the coal and potato dealer should be provided for by the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, which was then before Parliament, and a place was secured for him as a third charity inspector. The act received the royal assent on the 14th August. He was immediately written to, and desired to come home, for a lucrative Government office had been provided for him by one of the highest in the land. He arrived in England early in 1856, and had to undergo two months' preparation before his friends dared to let him enter the office of the Charity Board. He was then recommended to her Majesty as duly qualified, and appointed by the Queen on the 21st April, all three appointments of inspectors having been kept vacant for eight months, until he returned to England and was prepared, although the Attorney-General had declared, on the 8th August in the preceding year, that their immediate appointment was absolutely necessary for the administration of the law. This corrupt appointment was connected with a scandalous transaction, in which a cabinet minister was deeply implicated.

Mr. Bruce had wished that the tone and language adopted by the hon. member had been such that the Government could have acceded to the motion. The Charity Commissioners were men of well-known ability, integrity, and industry, and did not require any defence from him. Of Mr. Simons's life previous to his entering into the office he knew nothing. In answer to inquiries, he learned that he had performed his duties satisfactorily; and it was most ungenerous on the part of the hon. gentleman to rake up the past as he had done, especially as not the slightest allegation was made against him subsequent to his appointment. If the hon. member for Devonport had made this motion for inquiry in common decency, or with a sense of justice, he (Mr. Bruce) should have only been too glad to accede to it, as he was assured that it would redound to the honour and credit of the commissioners, and lead to an extension of the powers so advantageously bestowed on them; but he trusted that the House, receiving the assurance of the Government that they would have had no objection to a general inquiry, would reject a motion introduced upon imputations so lavishly made, and advanced upon so poor a foundation of proof, and by so doing censure the course pursued by the hon member for Devonport.

After some debate, the House divided—

YORK ASSIZES.

Mr. S. Estcourt gave notice that he should, on going into supply on Monday next, move a resolution relative to the removal of the assizes from York to Leeds.

TITLES TO LAND (IRELAND).

Mr. Scully asked the Attorney-General for Ireland whether his attention had been called to the Parliamentary return No. 363, as to the transfer of land, presented to the House on the 7th June instant, shewing that the poundage (above ad valorem duties) paid to the Consolidated Fund was 87l. 6s., for obtaining indefeasible titles under the English Land Transfer Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, to estates in England, the gross value whereof was 98,499l., and that the poundage (above ad valorem duties) payable to the Consolidated Fund for obtaining indefeasible title to estates of the like value in Ireland, under the Irish Land Transfer Acts, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 72, and the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 123, would be 492l. 9s. 11d., being rather more than five and a half times the poundage chargeable for indefeasible titles to English estates; and whether he would endeavour to remedy that anomaly through his promised measure for registering titles to land in Ireland.

The Attorney-General for Ireland said he was not quite certain that it was possible entirely to remedy the anomaly, but the matter should have his attention.

LAW OF PARTNERSHIP.

Mr. Bright, in the absence of his colleague (Mr. Scholefield), asked the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government was prepared to bring in a bill this session for the amendment of the law of partnership.

Mr. M. Gibson said so much had already been done on this question, and so much discussion had taken place, that although it was late in the session he should be prepared to lay a bill on the table. It was in a simpler form than that of the honourable member for Birmingham, and, therefore, he should be able to take an early opportunity of bringing it before the House.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

TRINITY TERM, 1864.

INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.

THE Examiners have on former occasions thought it right, in making their report to the council, to mention the names of those candidates who had passed the examination with distinction.

In the present term, however, the papers of the majority of the candidates were of such uniform merit, that the Examiners feel it would be difficult, and perhaps invidious, to make selections.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 148, the whole of whom were passed.

By order of the Council,

E. W. WILLIAMSON, Secretary.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

AT the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the Superior Courts, the Examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of twenty-six, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

1. Frederic Ferdinand Smallpeice, aged twenty, who served his clerkship to Messrs. W. H. & M. Smallpeice, of Guildford; and Mr. Edward Brodribb Randall, of London.

Law Societies and Institutions.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of the Department of Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Laws of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, was held on Monday at the offices, 3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall. Lord Brougham occupied the chair. It appeared from the Report, that since the union of the society with the Social Science Association, eleven meetings had been held, and six papers read. The document shewed the progress of the society in other respects, and on the motion of Mr. P. Urquhart, M.P., seconded by Sir E. Wilmot, it was adopted.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—At a meeting of the Juridical Society, held on Monday evening at the society's chambers, 4, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, Mr. Clark in the chair; Mr. F. Worsley opened a discussion on "Certain Propositions for the Relief of the Home Secretary from the present Responsibility on the Conviction of a Person for Murder, and to substitute an improved Procedure." After entering briefly into the question of capital punishment, and the changes that had taken place from time to time with respect to the prerogative of mercy, and pointing out some of the effects of the present system, and the public dissatisfaction it engendered, Mr. Worsley proceeded to propose, that the Home Secretary, after a conviction for murder, be relieved of his present responsibility, by the substitution by statute of the following procedure:—1. That on a trial for murder at the assizes, both judges of assize shall preside, and two judges of the superior court at such trial at the Central Criminal Court. 2. That on the conviction of the prisoner, judgment of death shall not be immediately pronounced, unless both the presiding judges, either at the Central Criminal Court or the Assizes, agree that the verdict is proper, and that such judgment should follow it. But if the said judges do not so agree, or agree that a sentence of penal servitude for life should be pronounced, it shall be lawful for them to pronounce the latter sentence in place of the capital sentence. 3. That nothing in this act shall affect the discretion of the said presiding judges to postpone either of the above sentences to the last day of the assizes, but they shall both personally preside at the delivery of the sentence of death. 4. That on the prisoner being called upon to receive sentence of death, he shall be allowed, either in person or by counsel, to state grounds of fact for the extension to him of the mercy of the Court, and it shall be incumbent on the said presiding judges to take into consideration such facts, or to receive and consider any petitions which may be then laid before them on behalf of such prisoner; and it shall be competent for them, if they see fit, to adjourn the passing of the sentence of death for their consideration of the said facts or petitions. 5. The sheriff shall not execute the sentence of death till ordered by the Home Secretary; and between the sentence and its execution, the said judges shall allow such time as they may deem reasonable for receipt and consideration by them of any petitions or grounds which may be laid before them in favour of the condemned person's life, and at the expiration of such reasonable time the said judges shall report to the Home Secretary whether they are of opinion that the prisoner should be executed or sentenced to penal servitude for life, or pardoned; and the Home Secretary shall advise the Crown accordingly; and he shall not order the execution or other punishment of the condemned person until he have received such report from the said judges; and the Home Secretary shall transmit to them any petition he may receive in favour of the condemned person. 6. If the said judges, or either of them, report to the Home Secretary that an inquiry should be made into the sanity of the condemned person, the Home Secretary shall cause such inquiry to be made by competent persons, and on their certificate of the insanity of the condemned person the Home Secretary shall grant a warrant for his removal to a lunatic asylum. 7. That every prisoner on a charge of murder shall be tried by a jury, and shall not be called upon to plead. A discussion ensued, in which the Chairman, Mr. F. Lawrence, Mr. J. O. Griffiths, Mr. Edward Webster, Mr. C. H. Hopwood, and Mr. C. C. Massey took part. At the conclusion of the discussion, a vote of thanks to Mr. Worsley and another to the Chairman, brought the proceeding to a close.

That is a clear statement of the rule of law upon the subject."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JULY 2, 1864.

IN two former articles (9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 49, and ante, p. 247) we have endeavoured to trace the fluctuations of judicial decision on two or three of the most important questions relating to creditors' deeds, under sects. 192-200, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. The points about which the greatest controversy has arisen have been as to the necessity of a cessio bonorum—as to what constitutes such unreasonableness in the provisions of a registered deed as to vitiate it—and also as to the effect of an intended exclusion or preference of any class of creditors, or an individual creditor. We are not certain, however, that great as have been the theoretical difficulties in reconciling the provisions of these "deed clauses" to pre-existing conceptions of law, still more serious embarrassment has not attended the practical attempts which have been made to give them effect. In passing the enactments which are comprised in sects. 192-200, the Legislature intended to place in the hands of the mercantile community a kind of self-regulating machinery which would require the least possible amount of professional assistance or official interference. The statute itself provides a form of deed which is to answer all ordinary purposes; and the statutory requirements, as to its execution and registration, have the recommendation, at least in appearance, of a charming simplicity. Having copied from Schedule (D.) the form of the deed, it is only necessary that a "majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of such debtor whose debts shall respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, shall, before or after the execution thereof by the debtor, in writing, assent to or approve of such deed or instrument."

The execution of the deed by the debtor himself is required to be attested by a solicitor; but there is in the act no such provision as to its execution or adoption by creditors. All that it requires is "an affidavit by the debtor or some person able to depose thereto, or a certificate by the trustee," that such majority of the creditors had, "in writing, assented to or approved of" the deed.

Simple as the words, "a majority in number representing three-fourths in value," may seem to be, they very soon gave rise to one very important and difficult practical question, viz. whether, in estimating the "number and value" of the creditors, those who held securities, whether ample or deficient, were excluded wholly or pro tanto the value of their securities; and in the latter event, whether there was any practicable mode of ascertaining the value of the securities, for the purpose of arriving at the proportion of indebtedness remaining unsecured? Neither the statute, nor the General Orders which came into operation along with it, contained any provision touching the point; and accordingly, it has ever since been a serious practical puzzle to the majority of persons who desire to make an honest use of the machinery provided by this part of the act; while it has no doubt proved very convenient to many others, who have been thus enabled to force from their unsecured creditors terms which would not have been otherwise conceded by them, and which secured creditors were willing to concede only because, in fact, they had no real interest in the matter.

Strange to say, this question has not yet been definitively settled by paramount authority, although it has been raised more than once or twice, and has been directly the subject of judicial decision. The case of Ex parte Godden, re Shettle (1 De G., J., & S. 260), expressly raised the point now under consideration; and the judgment of the Lords Justices might be considered as conclusive on the question, if there were no conflicting authorities. Their Lordships were of opinion, that in reckoning the proportion of assenting creditors, under sect. 192, the debts due to secured as well as to unsecured creditors must be taken into account. Lord Justice Knight Bruce considered that the word "creditors" ought to receive "a literal interpretation, an interpretation in conformity with grammar and idiom." Lord Justice Turner's view was the same in effect. Both their Lordships considered that they were not at liberty, and certainly that they were not compelled by any inconvenience likely to arise from such an interpretation, to do otherwise than give a grammatical construction to the words of the act. No doubt, it may be forcibly argued, that the result of this view will be, in many cases, to place the unsecured creditors completely at the mercy of those who hold sufficient security, and who, therefore, have no real interest in the estate to be administered under the deed; and thus the debtor will be enabled, by means of the friendly co-operation of the latter, to force the former to favourable terms. But, on the other hand, it would be equally unfair to exclude all creditors holding any security, however insufficient it might be; and a very common case is that of a secured creditor, with a security not quite covering his debt.

One would think that the most rational course to adopt, under these circumstances, would be to provide some mode for the valuation of securities where creditors in possession of them allege that they are insufficient, and desire to come in under a creditors' deed. This would at once put an end to all questions, whether secured creditors should be reckoned, in respect either of number or value, and would remove one of the most serious obstacles to the adoption of these statutory deeds; but neither the act nor any General Order has condescended to such useful details, although many other particulars, quite as minute, are to be found in both. It is, therefore, necessary to proceed with our investigation of the judicial decisions on this subject. We have seen that the Lords Justices have distinctly pronounced upon it, albeit with some plaintive remonstrances from Lord Justice Knight Bruce, upon the task which the Legislature had imposed upon the Court. Their Lordships' decision has recently come under the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, and been unanimously adopted by the four judges who presided on the occasion, including Lord Chief Justice Erle. This was in the case of Turgand v. Moss (12 Weekly Rep. 960.) If, therefore, there were no other authorities upon the question, it might now be deemed to be conclusively settled, however inconvenient and sometimes unjust the practical result might be. But the Lord Chancellor evidently entertains a different view. In Ex parte Spyer (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 950) his Lordship remarked, that "creditors under a deed of trust are put in the same position in which creditors under a fiat are placed by the bankrupt law. Secured creditors, therefore, rank under the deed of trust for the amount remaining, after deduction of the value of their securities." And again, in Ex parte Morgan (Id. 559), his Lordship made an observation to the same effect—"Creditors under a trust deed are in eodem statu as creditors under a bankruptcy. But creditors under a bankruptcy cannot prove without allowing for the value of their securities, and creditors under trust deeds are subject to the same obligation."

In a more recent case before the Lord Chancellor (Ex parte Smith), his Lordship has been called upon to reconsider these dicta in the light of the opposite decisions to which we have referred; and after a second argument of the case, judgment has been reserved; so that, no doubt, we shall shortly be in possession of the Lord Chancellor's decision. It is manifest, however, that, whether he supports his own dicta, or the opposite decisions, abundant inconvenience, if not injustice, will remain. If secured creditors are to have a voice where they have no interest, it must often work injustice. If creditors are to be wholly excluded because their debt is partially covered by security, that will also be productive of injustice; but either of these two courses appears to be at present inevitable, since no means are provided for arriving at a valuation of securities so as to prevent secured creditors from interfering further than to the degree in which they are unsecured.

It is evident that this serious defect in the machinery of the statute will require a speedy remedy, unless the whole scheme of registered deeds is to be given up. A new General Order in Bankruptcy, which has just been issued, requires, that every deed presented to the Chief Registrar for registration under the act, shall in future be presented by a solicitor, and that every memorandum delivered with such deed shall be signed by a solicitor. This Order has been issued in consequence of the serious and constant complaints that have been made as to the manner in which these deeds have been contrived and managed by law stationers, accountants, and others, who, not being officers of the court, have felt themselves very much at liberty to disregard the risk of its censure. All that the Chief Registrar can do when one of these deeds is brought for registration, is to see that, ex facie, there is a compliance with the requirements of the statute. But not only is he without any instructions as to the relative rights of secured and unsecured creditors, but he has no means of judging whether the creditors who are alleged to have assented have really done so, or whether, as in the case of Re Rawlings (1 De G., J., & S. 225), the assent was purely hypothetical or conditional. The only assurance to the registrar, that the conditions of sect. 192 have been observed, was, as we have seen, an affidavit "by some person," or "a certificate by the trustee," to such effect. A memorandum of this kind, signed by a solicitor, will henceforth be required in every case, and it will, of course, be his duty to satisfy himself, that no fraudulent or reckless use is made of the machinery of the act.

Principles of Conveyancing, Explained and Illustrated by Concise Precedents. With an Appendix on the Effect of the Transfer of Land Act in modifying and shortening Conveyances. By HERBERT LEWIS, B.A., late Scholar of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Seco., pp. 518. [Butterworths.]

ALTHOUGH Mr. Lewis's work displays both ability and learning, we think that hereafter its author will regret the publication of it, and wish that he had limited himself to the carrying out of his main, but somewhat superfluous, design, which, he says, was "to supply something to bridge over the passage from the study of the law of real and personal property to that of the application of its principles to the preparation and construction of conveyances." "The many volumes of precedents in conveyancing already published," he adds, "contain principally forms which were devised and arranged to meet the exigencies of actual practice, and which are, therefore, valuable to the practitioner, but which on that very account are not generally suitable for the instruction or comprehension of a beginner. Such forms often substantially embrace several conveyances in one instrument, and contain special modifications designed for peculiar circumstances; are generally laden with much verbiage, and many clauses whose use has become obsolete; and, finally, are arranged for convenience of reference rather than for purposes of instruction. Further: the notes and dissertations which usually accompany such precedents are chiefly directed to the explanation of their peculiarities, and but little to those ordinary and generic portions which the practitioner is supposed to understand, but in respect of which the student is most in want of information."

"It is no wonder, then, that in perusing such volumes an inexperienced person is at a loss to discriminate between what is useful, essential, accidental, or generic, and what is simply useless and burdensome, in the several precedents they contain; and that, as a consequence, it is not too much to say, that many, even after the advantage of a course of study in a conveyancer's chambers, often commence practice with very misty and inadequate notions of the real use and object of the various clauses of a conveyance, and of the true principles on which they should be framed."

We do not know what work was in Mr. Lewis's contemplation when he wrote these remarks, but if they refer to the collection, now principally in use, of Mr. Davidson, ably edited by Messrs. Wright and Whaley, nothing can be more unjust. The precedents are simple and intelligible, contain no obsolete matter, and are expressed with at least as much brevity as suits the habits and wishes of the profession at large. The general rules of law on which they depend, and the object to be kept in view in framing or adapting them to use, are well explained in the dissertations, while the notes supply information on matters of detail where it is required. Certainly, the traveller who requires a bridge between Josh. Williams and Davidson had better seek easier ground than he will find in the Alpine region of the law. Mr. Lewis says, that "he has endeavoured to introduce the reader to the novelties and difficulties of the subject by degrees; and thus he hopes to lead the student on from step to step." If this means anything different from that logical and systematic arrangement and development of the subject which every institutional writer aims at, and which is common to the Principia and the most elementary school book, it means, a futile attempt to degrade the subject to "the level of the meanest capacity," which the meanest capacity will resent.

For a book, on any subject, written with such a design, there is no room. There was, however, room for a book on the structure and interpretation of deeds and other instruments generally, as distinguished from the details of particular classes of instruments; and though Mr. Lewis has not sketched even a complete outline of such a treatise, he has collected and set forth (in a style not more elegant and exact than that of the above extracts) a great deal of useful information of this kind, the value of which, however, is often impaired by the intermixture of the author's novel and somewhat rash deductions.

After explaining, with more or less of success, the "primary object and design of the book," Mr. Lewis proceeds thus:—"But the author is well assured that a tendency to cultivate brevity is now becoming very general among draftsmen, especially in the country; and he has, therefore, studied to select his precedents, and frame his observations, with a view to practical utility, and so as to afford information to draftsmen desirous of safely abbreviating such conveyances as they may actually be called upon to construct." This sentence, inaccurate and redundant, is a fit introduction to the precedents which our author has abbreviated, according to our judgment, neither wisely nor well. A few extracts from a single example—the precedent (No. 13) of a mortgage of freeholds—will be sufficient to illustrate the rash carelessness of this "pioneer in an almost untrodden path."

"Provided always, and the said B. doth hereby for himself and his heirs, covenant with the said A. and his heirs, that if the said A. or his assigns shall, on or before the — day of —, repay to the said B., his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the said sum of £—, together with interest for the same in the meantime after the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum, without any deduction or abatement whatever, then the said B. or his assigns shall and will, at any time thereafter, upon the request, and at the costs and charges of the said A., reconvey the said hereditaments and premises unto the said A., his heirs or assigns, or as he or they shall direct, free from all incumbrances whatsoever made or permitted by the said B."

Here, all the words which we have printed in italics are unnecessary, while two of them (allowing of repayment before the day, and to the heirs of the mortgagee) are wrong; and yet, in straining after brevity, many essential words have been struck out, so that no provision is made for redemption on repayment by the heirs, or by the executors or administrators of the mortgage; or for reconveyance by the heirs of the mortgagee; or for reconveyance at the request of the heirs or of the assigns of the mortgagor; or against incumbrances by the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of the mortgagee. It is true that some, perhaps all, of these omissions might be supplied by a liberal exercise of equitable jurisdiction; but when a draftsman undertakes to provide for the doing of certain things, it is his business to express completely and exhaustively, in clear (which may be also concise) language, under what conditions, and by whom, they are to be done. Mr. Lewis gives at great length, and in a style quite sufficient to confuse a weak-minded student, reasons for some, but not for the greater part, of his omissions.

In another precedent (No. 16, mortgage in fee by way of condition or executory use), the author appears to have pursued novelty with more eagerness than discretion. "This precedent," he says, "is an attempt to effect a mortgage such that the lands shall revert in the mortgagor and his assigns, without the intervention of a reconveyance, on a simple repayment of the mortgage money, acknowledged by the parties entitled to it, and which yet shall afford the mortgagee all the security necessary for the recovery of his money, and enable the parties taking the mortgage debt alone to sell, and make a good title to the purchaser." The operative part of the deed commences thus:—"Now, this indenture witnesseth, that in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the sum of £— accordingly this day paid by the said B. [the mortgagee] (the receipt whereof the said A. [the mortgagor] doth hereby acknowledge), he, the said A., doth hereby grant unto the said B. all that [parcels], to hold the same unto the said B. and his heirs, to the use of the said B. and his heirs: Provided nevertheless, and on condition, that if the said A. (the mortgagor) shall, before the expiration of twenty-one years from the decease of the survivor of them, the said A. and B., pay to the said B., his executors, administrators, or assigns, the said sum of £—, together with interest in the meantime thereon, or on so much thereof as may for the time being be unpaid, after the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum, regularly half-yearly, on the — day of —, and the — day of —, in every year; and if the said B., his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns shall, within the period aforesaid, acknowledge the payment of the said moneys in manner aforesaid, by signing the memorandum on these presents indorsed (and which memorandum so signed shall be conclusive evidence to satisfy this condition, of the payment of the said moneys in manner aforesaid), then these presents and the estate hereby granted shall immediately cease and be void. Nevertheless, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that this present proviso or condition shall not have the effect of prolonging or extending any right or equity of redemption of the said A., or those claiming under him, any further, or for any longer period than he or they would have been entitled to such right or equity, if this proviso or condition had provided that the grant should be void only on payment in manner aforesaid of the said moneys, on the — day of — next ensuing. And the said A. doth hereby, for himself and his heirs, covenant with the said B., that he, the said A. or his assigns, will, on or before the expiration of the said period, but if and whenever requested so to do by the said B. by notice in writing, then on or before the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt of such notice pay to the said B. or his assigns the said sum of £—; and also will in the meantime pay to the said B. or his assigns interest on the said sum of £—, or on so much thereof as shall for the time being be unpaid, after the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum, half-yearly, on the — day of —, and the — day of —, in every year." Then follows a proviso against paying off the mortgage without notice, and then this covenant:—"And the said B. doth hereby, for himself and his heirs, covenant with the said A., that on payment, in manner mentioned in the proviso hereinbefore contained, of the said principal moneys and interest, he will forthwith sign, or procure to be signed, the said memorandum indorsed on these presents in manner hereinbefore provided." Then follow covenants for title; a covenant for quiet enjoyment by A. during six months; a power of sale by the mortgagee, his executors, administrators, or assigns; and a covenant not to exercise the power without notice. The form of the memorandum of payment is not given; and there no power is given to the mortgagee to let—an omission which is, indeed, judicious, inasmuch as the performance of the condition for divesting the estate would defeat the mortgagee's leases.

We have printed the superfluous words in italics: and it will be observed, that the omission of those which occur in the proviso as to the equity of redemption will also make the sentence grammatically coherent. In substance, as in language, the condition for divesting the estate, and its attendant clauses, are redundant and inaccurate. The intention is, that the signature, by the person for the time being entitled to the mortgage debt, of an endowed acknowledgment of satisfaction, shall determine the fee; and it would have been sufficient (if the scheme were admissible in any form) to say so. But our author first says, that the estate shall cease on payment of the money, and signature of the memorandum; and then he says, that it shall cease on signature of the memorandum, whether the money is paid or not. Further, he says, that signature of the memorandum, either by the heirs or by the executors or administrators of the mortgagee, shall determine the estate. This not only confers on the heirs a power which they ought not to have, and provides occasion for difficult questions between them and the executors or administrators, but adds another complication to the difficulty of determining the meaning of the word "assigns" in the proviso. If the heirs can determine the legal estate, can their assigns? and if so, must every individual in whom the least scrap of legal title is vested, including a tenant at will, concur; or can each particular assign determine his own particular estate, leaving the others outstanding? If "assigns" means or includes assigns of the debt—which is a chose in action—does it include trustees, with or without a power of attorney, and exclude beneficiaries, or how otherwise? A proviso for vesting or divesting a legal estate ought to indicate with absolute certainty the conditions on which it is to take effect.

The covenant for payment of the debt gives to the mortgagor for payment twenty-one years after the death of the survivor of the parties, unless the mortgagee can prove service on the mortgagor or his assigns personally of a demand of payment, made in writing by the mortgagee; and then he has six months' grace. No provision is made for a demand by the executors, administrators, or assigns of the mortgagee, or upon the executors or administrators of the mortgagor; and we are not so well satisfied as Mr. Lewis seems to be, that the law would, in an action of covenant or debt, supply these omissions, whether with the help or in spite of the discrepancies between the covenant in question and the mortgagee's covenant not to sell until after six months' default in payment pursuant to a demand of payment made by the mortgagor on the mortgagee or his heirs.

Lastly, it is to be remarked, that the mortgagee covenants, that if the mortgagor pays the money at any time within the twenty-one years after the death, &c., he will forthwith sign the indorsed memorandum, and the mortgagor expressly reserves power to pay off the debt at the end of that remote period, without giving any previous notice to the mortgagee to find a fresh investment.

Inaccurate language always indicates incompleteness or error in conception. Whether the error in the following passage is due to mere confusion of ideas, or to a distinct mistake of the law, may admit of question. The writer is speaking of conditions for entry:—"We must add, that the entry for non-render of rent and other services, though originally it was in right of a forfeiture caused by such non-render, is now only allowed for the purpose of distraining the goods and chattels to be found on the land, and not for the purpose of permanently resuming the possession of the land." And for this we are referred to Tudor's L. C., R. P., 174. We need scarcely say, that Mr. Tudor's learned and accurate commentary on Clun's case does not sanction this statement.

While commenting on the defects of the statutory power to appoint new trustees contained in the stat. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, s. 27, Mr. Lewis says, "It has been doubted whether a surviving or continuing trustee, who is not also surviving and continuing, can appoint under the act; and it has been held that the act does not apply to the case of all the trustees retiring simultaneously (Stones v. Rowton, 17 Beav. 308); and other difficulties have arisen." Now, the clause in question is defective enough, but it has not been held that it does not apply to the case of all the trustees retiring simultaneously. The act was passed in 1860; Stones v. Rowton was decided in 1853, upon the construction of a power very different from that in Lord Cranworth's Act. The question upon the power in that act will be, what is meant by "the last retiring trustee?" taking in aid the enactment in the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, that one shall mean many.

On the whole, we think, that though the work contains much valuable information, and many useful hints, it is so disfigured by faults of style and errors of judgment, as to be unfit for the use of students.

A much more promising attempt to introduce short forms was made, some years ago, by Mr. Herman L. Prior, in his "Complete Manual of Short Conveyancing," the forms in which are extremely concise and well expressed, and are for the most part sufficiently comprehensive. But Mr. Prior's forms have not come into use, nor can any such forms come into use until the conditions of professional remuneration are altered.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.—ALTERATION OF RULES.

THE registrar of friendly societies in England, having received from members of such societies inquiries as to the effect of the alteration of rules, has thought it right to lay a case before the Attorney-General on the subject. The following is a copy of such case, and the Attorney-General's opinion thereon:—

CASE.

"A society was established in the year 1830, under the Friendly Societies Acts, for the purpose of insuring to each member, paying a certain monthly contribution, a fixed weekly sum in sickness, a fixed weekly allowance after sixty, and a certain sum at death.

"By the acts in force at the time of the establishment of the society, alterations in the rules might be made, and, when certified, were to be binding on the several members and officers of the society. (See 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 9).

"By the present Friendly Society Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 27, the rules may be altered by a resolution of a meeting specially called for that purpose.

"Under the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 9, the votes of three-fourths of the members present at a general meeting were required to carry any alteration; but under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 27, a simple majority of the votes of the members present is sufficient.

"In consequence of the funds of the society being much reduced, it is intended to frame new rules, which it is proposed to have certified, either increasing the contributions payable by the members, or reducing the benefits in sickness, old age, and at death; and these new rules are to apply to all the present as well as the future members.

"It is contended on the one hand, that as the present members joined with a knowledge that the rules might be altered, they have no reason to complain of the new rules, whilst on the other hand it is contended, that these new rules cannot affect the present members, as that would be a breach of the contract made with the members when they entered the society; and that, although the rules may be altered, there is no provision in the act as to altering the tables; but on this point it is presumed, that as the tables are referred to in the rules, they are incorporated with them, and might be repealed.

"The Attorney-General is requested to advise whether the altered rules will be binding upon the members admitted into the society before such rules were certified."

"I am of opinion that the altered rules will be binding upon the members admitted into the society before the new rules were certified, except as to any relief, annuity, or other benefit from the funds of the society, of which any member (or the wife, nominee, or child of any member) may be then in the actual receipt, or entitled to the actual receipt, under the existing rules. With regard to all future prospective and contingent benefits, the rights to which may not, at the time of making the new rules, have become vested and absolute by reason of any event then already past, the new rules will, I think, be binding upon all the members.

"In order to make the new rules valid, they must be made in a manner conformable to the provisions of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 9, and by the majority of three-fourths there required.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, June 23.

STAMP DUTY ON BANKERS' ORDERS.

Mr. Alderman Salomons asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was true that an order addressed to bankers or other persons for any payment of money, whether as dividend or otherwise, and which hitherto had been exempt from stamp duty, as being neither a letter nor a power of attorney, was, by a new construction put by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on the act of the present session, to be made liable to the duty of 5s., or any other duties charged on letters or powers of attorney; and if so, whether such new construction would not be a great hardship on individuals, and an interference with established usage.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought his hon. friend was under a mistake as to his facts. The act of the present session had no bearing, except to reduce the existing duties. No new construction had been placed on the law as it now stood, and as it stood up to the passing of the act of the present session. Some persons having felt a doubt whether orders of the character referred to, and which were in extensive use, were liable to stamp duties as powers of attorney, an opinion of the law officers of the Crown had been taken, and that opinion was that such orders were liable. The date of that opinion was as old as December, 1860. The question was not one of the revenue department, and there were penalties for not using the stamps. The question was simply one bearing on the legality of the instruments if contested in a court of law.

THE HIGHWAY ACT.

Mr. Dodson asked whether, under the Highways District Act of 1862, the towns not subject to the jurisdiction of the board, but adjoining or surrounded by highway districts, were legal places for the meeting of the boards.

Sir G. Grey.—Under the Highway Act of 1862 some doubts existed on this point, but by an amendment to the Local Government Act made last session, towns adjoining or surrounded by highway districts were constituted legal places for the meeting of the highway district boards.

REMOVAL OF PAUPERS AND CRIMINALS FROM JERSEY TO SOUTHAMPTON.

Mr. D. Seymour rose to call the attention of the House to the system pursued of removing paupers and persons under sentence of banishment from Jersey to the seaports of England, especially Southampton, and to ask the Home Secretary whether he had received any report upon the subject from the Lieutenant-Governor of Jersey. He said that he had previously brought the question before the House upon a memorial from the corporation of Southampton, complaining that people under sentence for crime, and paupers, were provided with a free passage from Jersey, and shipped to Southampton and other ports, where they became a burthen to the ratepayers. He had fortified himself with evidence upon the subject, and he found that in 1847 the commissioners on the state of the criminal law in the Channel Islands, and in 1859 the civil law commissioners of Jersey, alike in their reports shewed that this was the practice of the authorities there. The town clerk of Southampton had written to him, stating, that since July, 1861, to December, 1863, no less than thirty-two persons either under sentence of banishment, or paupers who had no settlement in Jersey, had in this way been deported, become chargeable to the rates, and in that time cost the parish not less than 250*l*. It appeared, too, that persons convicted of heinous crimes in Jersey were brought in, with the permission of the Home Office, to the English hulks, and there kept to serve out their time at the expense of the English nation. According to statistics, it had been ascertained that free passes to paupers to leave the island amounted in 1861, 1862, and 1863 to 1080, representing 1500 persons, or 500 persons a year. He thought this was a state of things which ought to be put an end to. The statement in the petition, that burglars and others convicted of similar offences were so removed was, he believed, a mistake; but so far as regarded persons under sentence for minor offences, and the wholesale deportation of paupers, he maintained that the practice he had complained of was still the law, and in operation.

Sir G. Grey said, he had received a report from the Governor of Jersey upon the subject; but as the memorial of the town council of Southampton did not refer to paupers, the report of the Governor only related to persons charged with crime. He thought the best plan of affording information on the subject would be to produce the memorial from the corporation of Southampton, his letter to the Governors of Jersey and Guernsey in reference to the matter, and their replies. If the hon. member would move for these documents, they should be laid on the table of the House.

THE ADMIRALTY COURT OF IRELAND.

Mr. Maguire asked the Attorney-General for Ireland when he would lay upon the table the promised bill for regulating and reforming the Irish Court of Admiralty, and what his intentions were with regard to that measure. He said, that when he (Mr. Maguire) brought in a bill last year for assimilating the Court of Admiralty in Ireland to that in England, he was sustained by memorials in favour of the measure from some of the foremost commercial bodies in the United Kingdom. The Irish Court had not been reformed for the last fifty or sixty years, while the Court in England had been reformed several times. Any difficulty attending assimilation of jurisdiction would be alight, compared with the benefit the change would bring to the public. The report of the commission was unanimous in favour of the assimilation between the practices of the two countries. On economical grounds, the diminution of charge in England had been attended with the most satisfactory results; for since the diminution, the fees had increased from 2000*l*. a year to 9000*l*. a year. The commissioners were opposed entirely to handing the jurisdiction over to any of the common-law judges, or to the Court of Probate. The chambers of commerce, and the consuls of foreign nations generally, were wholly in favour of assimilation. He hoped the Government would not neglect the demand which the public interests required, but state that they were ready to legislate on the subject.

The Attorney-General for Ireland said that, as one of the commissioners, he could only indorse the report, which, however, had only been issued a few days ago. Not an hour should elapse without the subject being considered by the Government, although he could not pledge himself that the state of public business this session would afford an opportunity for the introduction of a measure during the present year.

PENAL ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. Hunt gave notice of his intention to move an amendment to this bill, restoring the obligation to ticket of-leave convicts to report themselves monthly to the police.

LIABILITIES OF BARRISTERS ON ADMISSION TO THE BAR.

Colonel Bartolot asked the Attorney-General whether gentlemen becoming members of Lincoln's-inn had any, and what, means of ascertaining the pecuniary liabilities to which they thereby became subject, and whether the benchers claimed a power to alter their liabilities during their membership without their knowledge, and what restrictions there were to affect a member who desired no longer to remain a member of the inn.

The Attorney-General, in reply to the first question, said the hon. member could obtain the necessary information from the steward; to the second, that the benchers claimed only such power as every gentleman of the bar conceded by the form of his admission bond; to the third, that a gentleman wishing to retire had to give notice that he was no longer in practice, or that he meant to withdraw from practice, and pay a very small fee, after which he could retire.

STATE OF THE LAW COURTS.

Mr. M. Smith rose to call the attention of the House "to the buildings and sheds used for the superior courts of law and equity, and the inadequate accommodation afforded by them; and also to the delay on the part of the Government to introduce their promised measures for providing new courts of justice." The hon. member said he thought the question of the places in which the law of this country was administered, so as to be worthy of the country, was of greater importance than picture galleries and museums of art, useful even as those might be. The state of the courts of law was as bad as it was possible for them to be. In his notice he had used the term "buildings and sheds," and he thought the latter had fairly described many of the places in which courts of justice were held. The hon. member then referred to the generally unsatisfactory condition of the courts of common law at Westminster and Guildhall, and of the courts of equity at Lincoln's-inn, and expressed a hope that proper provision for the due and decent administration of justice would soon be made.

Mr. Mathins said, that four years ago the Lord Chancellor had told him to wait two years longer, and adequate law courts would be provided; but at the end of four years the matter was in statu quo. He would rather accept the proposal of the Society of Lincoln's Inn, to build three Vice-Chancellors courts within the inn than that the present state of things should continue.

The Attorney-General said, that certain interests had led, very much against the wish of the Lord Chancellor, to the delay that had taken place. He hoped to lay a bill on the table in a very short time on the subject, though at that period it would depend upon the facilities granted by the House whether it passed this session. At any rate, if it should not pass, an opportunity would be given of maturely considering it before next session. He agreed with the hon. and learned gentleman that the evil and scandal of the present state of things could not be exaggerated. It was of the greatest importance that the courts of common law, the courts of equity, and all the offices connected with them, should be placed on a more satisfactory footing. In his opinion, no scheme could be satisfactory which did not lay them all so near to each other as to give the greatest possible facility for the dispatch of business to those connected with the administration of justice. He was not prepared to agree to any arrangement that would permanently separate the courts of equity and the courts of common law. The Government was anxious, before introducing another bill on the subject, to be quite sure of their ground with regard to all the arrangements, more particularly those connected with the pecuniary department of the question. At the same time they were desirous to arrive at some plan which would avoid throwing any charge on the public purse; and it was thought that that might be accomplished by taking funds, amounting to 1,800,000*l.*, available for such a purpose, in the Court of Chancery. It would be necessary, in his opinion, to reserve a portion of that fund, in order to recoup advances made on account of annual charges. It was proposed to have an advance of 300,000*l.* by the public loan commissioners to reimburse them of a portion of it over a considerable number of years; and it was also proposed that fees of small amount should be levied on steps in proceedings in these new courts that did not contribute any portion of the Chancery funds. In that way the Court of Chancery would contribute funds that might be said to belong to nobody. Such was an outline of the plan contemplated by the Government. And even now a measure might be passed founded upon it; at all events, a bill framed on that plan would be laid on the table, and an opportunity would be given for considering it before next year.

Mr. Selwyn said, if the Government were really desirous of remedying the evil, they should bring in a bill on the subject; but as far as the equity courts were concerned, a remedy might be found without any expense to the public, through the offer of Lincoln's Inn. Concentration of the law courts could not be carried out altogether. The bill of 1859 might be revived; it might be passed in a few days, and the work accomplished next year. The courts of equity would then be all that was wanted, and at no expense whatever; and this part of the work having been accomplished, there would remain to be effected the provision for the law courts in a contiguous or distant locality, perhaps on the new Thames Embankment.

Mr. Cooper believed that what the hon. and learned gentleman proposed would be totally inadequate even for the equity courts, while it would not even touch the requirements of the courts of law. Instead of accepting in 1859 the offer of Lincoln's Inn, the then Government appointed a Royal Commission to consider a proposal for the concentration of the courts; that commission made their report, which met the approbation of the public; it was the duty of the present Government to carry out the scheme they recommended, and the House of Commons would not do their duty if they abandoned those recommendations.

Lord Hotham asked who had been selected as the architect. Mr. Cooper replied that the architect was to be selected by competition, as had been stated from the first. The subject then dropped.

The House went into committee on this bill, and the several clauses were agreed to, with some formal amendments.

GAOLS BILL.
Mr. Newdegate said, that this being the week when the quarter sessions were held in the various counties, it would be convenient to many hon. members if the right hon. gentleman, the Home Secretary, would state when he intended to proceed with the Gaols Bill.

Sir G. Grey said he thought the best plan would be to commit the bill pro forma, with a view to its being reprinted with amendments; and, when this was done, he would name the day for further progress with the measure.

OPEN SPACES NEAR THE METROPOLIS.
Mr. Doulton called the attention of the House to the gradual diminution of open spaces in and around the metropolis, and moved that it was the duty of her Majesty's Government to provide for the preservation of such open spaces within the limits assigned by the 14th section of the Inclosure Act of 1845. The hon. member said, that the common lands around London were being very generally inclosed and appropriated to building purposes, without authority. He hoped that the Government would introduce a bill conferring upon some public body the power of dealing with the question.

Mr. W. Williams seconded the motion.
Some discussion then ensued upon the subject.
Mr. Torrens suggested that the Attorney-General should be the officer appointed for taking the initiative in all cases of encroachments.

Mr. Cooper suggested that, instead of the resolution proposed, a committee should be appointed to inquire into the subject.

On the motion of Colonel W. Patten, it was resolved that all petitions presented to this House against the bill before the meeting of the select committee on the bill be referred to such committee, and that such petitioners as prayed to be heard by counsel, agents, and witnesses against the bill be heard accordingly, and counsel heard in favour of the bill against the said petitions.

ELECTION PETITIONS BILL.

The adjourned debate on Mr. Ayrton's amendment on going in committee on this bill, was resumed by Sir F. Goldsmid, who contended that the bill, so far from discouraging malâ fide petitions, would have the effect of discouraging those which were bonâ fide. The bill was founded on principles unjust and self contradictory. All investigations before Parliament, for the benefit of private individuals, took place at the expense of private individuals, whilst those which were of a public character were defrayed at the public expense. The hon. member was proceeding to argue against the measure, when

An Hon. Member moved that the House be counted, and as only sixteen members were present, the House adjourned.

Parliamentary Reports and Papers.Convention between Her Majesty and the King of Prussia, for the Mutual Surrender of Criminals.

THE following Convention, signed at London the 5th March, 1864 (Ratifications exchanged at London the 11th April, 1864), has just been presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of her Majesty, 1864:—

Art. 1. It is agreed that the high contracting parties shall, on requisition made in their name through the medium of their respective diplomatic agents, deliver up to justice persons who, being accused or convicted of any of the following crimes, namely—

1. Murder, comprehending the crimes of assassination, parricide, infanticide, and poisoning;
2. Attempt to commit murder;
3. Forgery, comprehending the counterfeiting of bank-notes, or public securities, or money;
4. Fraudulent bankruptcy;
5. Burglary (Nächtlicher Einbruch und Eindringen in ein Wohnhaus oder dazu gehöriges Nebengebäude mit der Absicht ein Verbrechen zu begehen);
6. Robbery with violence to the person robbed;
7. Larceny or embezzlement by clerks and servants (Diebstahl oder Unterschlagung durch öffentliche oder Privat-Beamte, Geschäftsgesellschaften und Gesinde); committed within the jurisdiction of the requiring party, shall be found within the territories of the other, provided that such persons are not subjects of the party upon whom the requisition is made. Provided also, that in the case of a person accused, the surrender shall be made only when the commission of the crime shall be so established, as that the laws of the country where the fugitive or person so accused shall be found would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime had been there committed; and that in the case of a person convicted, the surrender shall be made only on the production of an authenticated copy of his conviction, and on proof of his identity.

Consequently, on the part of the Prussian Government, the surrender shall be made only by the consent of the minister to whose department appertains the administration of justice, and after the production, in the case of a person accused, of a warrant of arrest or other equivalent judicial document, issued by a judge or other competent authority in the United Kingdom, clearly setting forth the acts for which the fugitive shall have rendered himself accountable; or, in the case of a person convicted, on the production of an authenticated copy of his conviction, and on proof of his identity.

On the part of the British Government, the surrender, in the case of a person accused, shall be made only on the warrant or other equivalent judicial document for the arrest of a fugitive, issued by a judge or magistrate duly authorised to take cognisance of the acts charged against the fugitive in Prussia, and on duly authenticated depositions or statements on oath before such judge or magistrate, clearly setting forth the said acts, or on such other evidence thereof as, according to the laws of England would warrant the apprehension of the said fugitive, and his committal for trial for the said acts, if they had been therein committed; or, in the case of a person convicted, on the production of an authenticated copy of his conviction, and on proof of his identity.

Art. 2. The expenses of any detention and surrender made in virtue of the preceding article shall be borne and defrayed by the Government in whose name the requisition shall have been made.

Art. 3. The present Convention shall come into operation as soon as the necessary legislative acts shall have been passed. Either of the high contracting parties shall be at liberty to give notice to the other at any time for its termination; and in such case it shall altogether cease and determine at the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

THE CASE OF MR. BEWICKE.

Report of the Select Committee.

THE report of the select committee appointed to consider the petition presented by Mr. William Bewicke, of Threepwood Hall, in the county of Northumberland, and to report its opinion as to whether he is entitled to any and what compensation, has been issued. The report is as follows:—

"Your committee, having inquired into the allegations of the petition, reports, that in its opinion Mr. Bewicke is not entitled to any compensation out of the public purse. Your committee is of opinion that, in order to lay any ground for a claim for such compensation, it was incumbent upon Mr. Bewicke to prove that there had been a miscarriage of justice in his case through the default of the persons charged with the administration of the law. And your committee, after careful inquiry, is satisfied that there was no such default. Your committee is unable to accede to the proposition, that persons who have been convicted in due course of law, by evidence subsequently proved to be false, are entitled to compensation out of the public purse; but even if your committee could have acceded to such proposition, there are circumstances in Mr. Bewicke's case that would, in the opinion of your committee, have taken it out of such general rule; Mr. Bewicke's own conduct, as admitted by himself, having, in the opinion of your committee, furnished material evidence in support of the accusation made against him, independently of other facts deposed to by witnesses of unimpeachable character. Inasmuch, however, as his goods and chattels at Threepwood Hall were, on his conviction of felony, forfeited to the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, and sold by them by auction before Mr. Bewicke obtained the Queen's pardon, your committee, in the special circumstances of the case, ventures to suggest, for the favourable consideration of the Crown, whether the full value of such goods and chattels at the time of the forfeiture should not be restored to him, minus the net produce of the sale by auction, already voluntarily paid over to Mr. Bewicke by the commissioners."

It appears from the report of the proceedings of the committee, that Mr. H. Berkeley proposed that 5000*l.* should be paid, and Lord John Manners had a similar proposition; but the draft report proposed by the chairman, Sir David Dundas, and Mr. Hunt was carried by a large majority; the only dissentients out of a committee of fifteen being Mr. Henry Berkeley, Lord John Manners, Mr. Liddell, and Mr. Baillie Cochrane.

Law Societies and Institutions.

UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY.—The thirty-second commemoration festival of this society was celebrated at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, on Tuesday last; Mr. Justice Shee, in the chair, supported by the Hon. G. Denman, Q. C., M. P., T. W. Greene, Esq., Q. C., Mr. Serjt. Parry, Mr. Josiah Wilkinson, Messrs. W. Watson, C. J. Shebeare, J. Gray, Q. C., J. Ivimey, J. Bird (coroner), Mr. Secondary Potter, H. Dyte, W. Field, Q. C., Vernon Harcourt, W. H. Bagshawe, H. Lewis (of Ely-place), Serjt. Simon, H. Linklater, J. W. Snell, &c. 300 gentlemen sat down to dinner.

In proposing the toast of "The Army, Navy, and the Volunteers," the learned chairman, whilst expressing his hope that peace would be preserved, said, that if ever the time should come for striking a blow, that blow would be a hard and decided one. As to the volunteer movement, it had removed the gross slander that this was a mere nation of shopkeepers.

Mr. Josiah Wilkinson (who is colonel of a regiment of volunteers) returned thanks for the volunteers.

The secretary, Mr. Rogers, then read the annual report of the committee of management, from which we give the following extracts:—

"The United Law Clerks' Society was established in 1832 for the purpose of enabling the law clerks of the metropolis to make, by means of small monthly subscriptions, some certain provision for themselves and families in the events of sickness, permanent disability, old age, or death. A benevolent fund was also formed by means of a quarterly subscription from every member and the voluntary contributions of the Profession, and which fund was to be employed in assisting, with small gifts of money, deserving clerks, including non-members and their families, when suffering from temporary distress not brought on by misconduct, and for which contingencies the principal fund could not be used. The result has been, that the benefits have been largely increased in amount without any corresponding increase of subscription, and the members' contributions, which, in 1833 only amounted to 157*l.*, now exceed 1000*l.* a-year. The first benefit to which the members are entitled consists of an allowance in sickness, so long as a member is thereby entirely incapacitated from attending to his duties. The expenditure on this account is gradually increasing. In addition to the allowance in sickness, the society grants to its members, when permanently disabled from following their employment through old age, or any infirmity of body or mind, pensions or superannuation allowances, payable weekly, and varying from 26*l.* to 36*l.* 8*s.* per year. The amount paid to the superannuated members during the year has been 316*l.* 10*s.*, and the total amount paid to them 3436*l.* 19*s.* In addition to the benefits already mentioned, the family of each member is entitled on his decease to a sum of 50*l.*, and a member surviving his wife is on her death entitled to 25*l.* The preceding payments have all been made out of the principal or general benefit fund. There has been received during the year on account of this fund 345*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* The capital is all invested with the National Debt Commissioners, and the reduced rate of interest allowed since 1850 will occasion considerable loss to the society, whose ability to meet the heavy obligations it is under to its members depends materially on the rate of interest it receives for its investments. The receipts of the benevolent or casual fund since the last anniversary have amounted to 571*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, and the expenditure, in gifts, loans, and necessary disbursements, to 459*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.* The balance added to the amount in hand at the close of the last year makes the present amount of this fund 570*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* During the past year this society has afforded to law clerks and their families pecuniary aid to the amount of 1798*l.* 17*s.*, and since its institution in 1832, to the amount of 29,161*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*"

The Chairman, in proposing the toast of the evening, expressed his satisfaction to find that from small beginnings this institution had, in the course of thirty years, progressed most favourably. It was most satisfactory to observe the amount of distress which had been relieved, and the encouragement which was given by the details contained in the report which had been read to all law clerks in this vast metropolis to become members. He was delighted to think, that next to the law clerks themselves, the chief supporters of the institution had been solicitors, barristers, and judges. The bench, indeed, had been amongst the earliest and earnest supporters of the society, for there was not one of the judges in the courts of law or equity who had not liberally contributed to its funds. When he was elevated to the bench, the law clerks, he had been told, would be a great trouble and annoyance to him, in all probability, but he had happily found the reverse to be the case; and he stated his conviction, that better conducted men he could not wish to meet with. Their general demeanour and conduct shewed they were justly entitled to a full share of that respect and consideration which were justly due to men holding such a laborious and responsible position. In the course of his eloquent address, the learned Chairman commented on various details of the report, and sat down amidst immense cheering.

The amount of donations and subscriptions announced reached 400l.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.—The National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, with which is united the Society for promoting the Amendment of the Law, will hold a special meeting at its offices, 3, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall, S. W., on Thursday, the 7th instant, when a paper will be read by Dr. Edward Smith, F.R.S., on "Jail dietary: the operations of the committee of the House of Lords, and of Sir George Grey's committee respecting it; and the present state of the question." The chair will be taken at eight o'clock.

Together with the Acts of Parliament, Forms, and Precedents relating to the subject. Being especially intended for popular use in Seaport Towns. By W. T. GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. "The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. But Mr. Greenhow has achieved it, and placed within reach of every one connected with shipping a valuable compendium of the law relating to that branch of industry."—Shipping and Mercantile Gazette.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JULY 9, 1864.

THE Report of the Committee on Law Reporting was published in full in one of our recent numbers (ante, p. 249), and we had hoped in this impression to notice its reception by the Profession. But the meeting of the Bar, which assembled at the Attorney-General's invitation, in Lincoln's Inn Hall, on the 1st instant, to consider this Report, discovered, after a very short discussion of the subject, that they were not yet sufficiently instructed to come to any conclusion; and accordingly the meeting was adjourned until some future day in November. As, however, in the mean while criticism, friendly or hostile, is courted by the committee, it will not be inopportune for us at once to record our views of this production, on which it is evident that, at any rate, pains and labour have been bestowed. It may be objected, that as our own existence will be imperilled by the success of the projected scheme, our criticisms are not likely to be very impartial. To remove any such impression from the mind of any casual reader, we must trust to the matter and quality of our remarks, and their inherent justness; but we may also observe, that we do not see much reason to fear the competition of the new series of reports advocated by the committee. And, in fact, we very much doubt the success of their scheme; for the financial portion, which ought to be the strongest, seems to us the weakest, part of the structure. Clause 21 admits, that "it is considered essential for carrying out the scheme, that the aggregate amount of subscriptions shall reach 10,000*l.* at the least," and as the whole series is priced at 5*l.* 5*s.* per annum, whilst the common law and equity series are separately priced at 3*l.* 3*s.* per annum, it follows that 2000 subscribers, or (as it is more probable that the lower-priced series would be preferred) 3000 subscribers, will have to be found before the new scheme can be even launched, or (as Mr. Amphlett remarked) before any publisher will look at it. The expectation of any aid, even by way of advance, from the Consolidated or Suits' Fund, is utterly chimerical and baseless, and subscribers to the new reports must be sought amongst the patrons of the numerous reports already in existence. To secure these, therefore, the new system ought to possess some very striking and superior advantages over the old; and we will, therefore, consider the new one a little more closely, to see if we can discover them. The defects of the present system are admitted on all hands. The authorised reports (as they are improperly, though usually, called) are expensive, irregular, and considerably in arrear; whilst the other reports are often indiscriminating, and sometimes hurried and incorrect: and moreover, unfortunate practitioners are obliged to peruse all, whether authorised or unauthorised, to the equal detriment of their purse and patience. Under the new system a council (incorporated by statute or charter) is to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, the Inns of Court, and the Incorporated Law Society; and this council is to have a paid secretary; and the expenses of the council and secretary, not exceeding 500*l.* a year, are to be guaranteed, not defrayed, by the Inns of Court. The council are to appoint editors and reporters, at salaries fixed by the Report, subject, however, to variation at the discretion of the council; and the appointments of the reporters are to be subject to the approval of the presiding judge in the court in which he is to report. The council are to have a general control over the reports, and over their mode, and time and price, and method of publication; but the editors are to supervise the reports, though their only defined duty is to select cases for reporting, upon the principle of rejecting all cases useless as precedents.

The particular duties of the editors and reporters are to be prescribed by the council, but no restriction is to be laid on their right to practise. The common-law and equity reports are to be published monthly, and the appellate reports when practicable; but the council are to have power, if they shall find it desirable, to establish in connexion with the permanent reports, a weekly set of reports besides. The existing reports are treated of only incidentally. It seems to be assumed that the present reporters of the authorised reports will be only too happy to take office under the new régime, or if these gentlemen should not prove sufficiently alive to the advantages of being thus absorbed, the places are to be offered to the reporters of any publication which may be discontinued in consequence of the issue of the reports recommended by the committee. Moreover, the committee are to have power to make such arrangements as will lead to the discontinuance of any set of existing reports, and for discharging the consideration for the same, by payments during a limited period out of profits. And judges and the profession generally are to be requested to give (seemingly) exclusive facilities to the compilers of new series.

The charges on profits are to be, first, the expenses of publication, sale, and distribution, including the commission to the publishers, and the first moiety of the salaries of the editors and reporters; secondly, the payment to the Inns of Court of the salary of the secretary and the other expenses of the council; thirdly, the payment of the second moiety of the above salaries, and the consideration (if any) for the discontinuance of any existing reports; fourthly, the augmentation of the salaries of the editors and reporters, and the constitution of a reserve fund. And the council are to contract with one or more publishers or printers, who shall undertake all the trouble and risk of the publication, sale, and distribution of the reports, receive the subscriptions, pay all expenses, and account to the council quarterly.

Now, the only novelty we can find in this scheme is this "imperium in imperio" of the "council." This body shadows forth the directorate, as the subscribers do the proprietary of a joint-stock company; but the resemblance is very faint and obscure, and in the nature of a "dissolving view." For the council are not only to be unpaid for all their time and trouble, but in their contracts they will have to pledge their own personal credit; and as far as we can see, this is their only use. The editorial part of the system is no novelty, for all the unauthorised series of reports are presided over by editors; whilst, amongst the authorised reporters, the principle of selection of cases for reporting, and in cases of joint reporting, a virtual headship of one of them, have always obtained. Cheapness of price is of course no inducement, unless all rivals are to be driven from the field. No greater guarantee for the correctness and regularity of the reports is given by the new scheme than already can be had under existing arrangements; in fact there will be less security for these essential points. At present both the fame and profit of the existing series depend on the character of the reports; whilst the editors and reporters of the new series will only be responsible to that anomalous body, the unpaid and (if they do their duty) over-worked council.

Upon the whole, we believe, that unless the existing reports are discontinued, it is impossible for the new reports to succeed; and here it is, in our opinion, that this committee have made a great mistake. If they had boldly proposed a joint-stock company to buy up the existing reports, we are not sure that its success would not have been great, and its advent hailed as a boon by the public as by the Profession, though even then it would have eventuated in a monopoly. But the committee, by some confusion of ideas, seem to have considered that, with the absorption of the existing reporters, the disappearance of the reports, with which their names are at present allied, would also follow, and that the publishers would submit without a murmur to the loss of a lucrative income. At any rate, their Report is open to this construction, for the hypothesis, that any publisher would be content to look for the payment of the purchase money of any series to the profits of the new series, is simply ridiculous; whilst, when all the existing reports are bought up, we shall be much surprised if any publisher be persuaded, even with a subscription list of 10,000*l.*, to undertake a contract wherein the payment of salaries only will require 11,200*l.* At the Bar meeting, Mr. Amphlett cautiously announced, that subscriptions to the extent of 10,000*l.* would be required before a publisher would entertain the question, but he did not say that he had found any to take the contract under those circumstances. As, however, it was requested that names of subscribers might be sent in before November, some test of the feasibility of the scheme in the minds of the Profession will be thereby afforded. It clearly is not to the taste of the present reporters; for at the meeting they complained that, if they gave in their adhesion, as contemplated, the result would be, that their discretion would be fettered, their responsibility frittered away, and their salaries diminished.

Finally, we would remark, that this Report has not obtained the concurrence of all the members of the committee, and that, of what may be called members in extensive practice, the numbers of assentients and dissentients are about equal; and, moreover, that it is vastly dissimilar from, and greatly inferior to, the plan propounded by Mr. Daniel, the promoter of the whole movement, which will be found in 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 204, which, while it took a much more comprehensive view of the whole subject, did not ignore vested interests.

This Report has not, either, found favour in the eyes of the public—not, at least, if we may judge from the public prints. The alternatives, however, that they suggest are impracticable, if not impossible. The judges have not the time to write their judgments, even if they had the capacity or the inclination. One Vice-Chancellor is known, despite the rebuke of a Lord Chancellor, never to write a judgment; whilst at least one Lord Justice and one Baron of the Exchequer would find much difficulty in making the reasons for their decisions apparent to the ordinary legal or lay understanding. Nor is it at all certain that it would be desirable to allow the Bench in all cases to revise their judgments before publication, although this is much more commonly the case at present than is generally known. It may easily be imagined by some, and it is well known to others, that although "hard cases make bad law" is a maxim which the Courts always profess to have in their memories, yet their real decisions are constantly, and consciously, and unconsciously, swayed and biassed by the circumstances of the case, and travel accordingly to the very verge of the law, if not beyond it; and the practice of revision would not tend to diminish this weakness—amiable as it may be.

We have not space, however, to examine here all the remedies that might have been applied to the diseased system of law reporting; but if, in pursuance of an useful suggestion at the meeting, all those who have nostrums to propose should send them to the committee before November, there may ensue therefrom some emendation of the Report which may make it more acceptable to those for whom it is designed.

EXEMPTION FROM INCOME TAX BY WILL

THE effect of a testamentary gift of an annuity clear of deductions, was considered in some recent cases, with results which are not easily reconcilable. In Festing v. Taylor (3 B. & S. 217, 235) the question arose upon a devise, by the late Duke of Somerset, of certain hereditaments, to the use that the Duchess should receive a yearly rent-charge of 2200*l.*, to be charged upon, and issuing out of, the said hereditaments, and to be paid to her half-yearly, "without any deduction or abatement whatsoever on account of any taxes, charges, impositions, or assessments already, or to be thereafter taxed, charged, assessed, or imposed on the said hereditaments, or on the said rent-charge, or on the said duchess or her assigns in respect thereof, by authority of Parliament, or otherwise howsoever." The question was raised upon a case stated for the opinion of the Court, between the Duchess, claiming right to distrain for and recover the amount of the deductions which had been made for income tax on payment of the rent-charge, and the tenant of part of the lands charged, insisting that the annuity had been fully paid; and the stat. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 60, Sched. (A.), No. iv, rule 10, allowing the landlord, owner, or proprietor of any hereditaments subject to a rent-charge, to deduct out of the rent-charge the amount of the income tax thereon; and the 73rd section of the statute, annulling all contracts, covenants, and agreements against the deductions and repayments provided for by the act; and the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 40, extending the provisions in the former act for deduction of income tax to every person liable to the payment of any rent, interest of money, annuity, or other annual payment, either as a charge on property or as a personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract, were cited. It was admitted, that in the case of a rent-charge created by an instrument inter vivos, a stipulation against the deduction of the income tax would be void, as was decided in Tinckler v. Prentice (4 Taunt. 549) and The Attorney-General v. Shield (3 H. & Norm. 834); and the Court of Queen's Bench considered, that though the prohibition in the acts did not extend to a will, the will gave a rent-charge of 2200*l.* only, from which the deduction of income tax for the benefit of the landowner was imperative under the acts, and not a rent-charge of variable amount, namely, 2200*l.* plus the amount of income tax for the time being payable. This decision was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, by Erie, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Williams and Byles, J.J., and Martin and Channell, BB., on the ground that the testator's intention was to give the full amount of the rent-charge free of income tax, and that there was nothing in the acts to prohibit such a gift. The result of the decision is, that a gift of a rent-charge free of income tax is a gift of a rent-charge equal to the specified annual sum, together with the amount of the income tax on the entire rent-charge (i. e. on the clear sum, and on the income tax payable). This amount the testator is considered to have charged on the tenant, and there is nothing to prevent his doing so. On the other hand, the tenant, pursuant to the express directions in the acts, deducts and retains the tax on the gross rent-charge, and pays the net balance to the devisee. This operation is consistent with the terms of the enactment, and with the intention of the testator. (See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 102).

In Festing v. Taylor, the deductions from which the rent-charge was to be free were referred to in very comprehensive terms, but the income tax was not specified. It had already been decided that a testamentary devise of hereditaments to trustees, in trust to pay an annuity, "free from income or property tax, or any other deduction," entitled the annuitant to payment free from that deduction, although Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., said—"This Court always holds that income tax is not a deduction." (Turner v. Mulhacur, 1 Johns. & H. 334). In Wall v. Wall (15 Sim. 513), an annuity given by will, "clear of all taxes and deductions," was held by Sir L. Shadwell, V. C., to be liable to deduction for income tax. "I have looked," he said, "at the 102nd section of the Property Tax Act, and it is quite plain, from the language of that section, that the thing that is given is the thing that is to pay the tax." But the question was as to the amount of the thing given. In Lethbridge v. Thurlow (15 Beav. 334), also, an annuity given by will, "clear of legacy duty, and every other deduction whatsoever," was held subject to deduction for income tax. One of the reasons given for the decision is remarkable:—"Income tax is not properly a deduction out of the estate or legacy, but a charge which the Legislature has fixed on the person himself." The other is still more remarkable:—"Besides, it would be a strong thing to say, that if a testator bequeathed a house, free from every deduction, it would throw the assessed taxes on his general personal estate."

In Abadam v. Abadam (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 505), the Master of the Rolls held, that an annuity, directed by a testator to be paid out of his personal estate, "without any deduction whatever," was subject to deduction for income tax. Festing v. Taylor was cited, and his Honor admitted, that the only question was as to the testator's intention; and in this case he considered that the testator had not pointed to the income tax, because that is not properly a deduction, but a charge on the income of the beneficiary. This is not very consistent with the Vice-Chancellor of England's remark, that "the thing that is given is the thing that is to pay the tax."

What, then, does the testator mean when he speaks of deduction? It is settled that his meaning includes deduction for legacy duty. (Barksdale v. Gilliat, 1 Swanst. 562). And when we have got so far as to include one tax in his meaning, it is not easy to see on what ground any other tax can be excluded. Indeed, deductions for taxes seem to be the only deductions to which a legacy or annuity given simpliciter can be liable.

We have, then, authority for these distinctions:—

An annuity given by will, to be paid without deduction, is to be paid without deduction for legacy duty, but not without deduction for income tax.

An amount given by will to be paid "clear of all taxes and deductions," is not to be paid clear of income tax, notwithstanding the word "taxes" in the plural.

A rent-charge given by will to be paid without deduction for any taxes, charges, impositions, or assessments on the hereditaments charged on the rent, or on the devisee of the rent in respect thereof, is to be paid without deduction for income tax.

Now, as both the legacy duty and the income tax are, in the case of an annuity given by will, to be deducted by the person who pays the annuity (36 Geo. 3, c. 52, ss. 6, 24, 25, 27; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 102; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 40), and as the income tax, in the case of a rent-charge, is not charged on the devisee of the rent, and is charged on the hereditaments out of which it issues, we are unable to see the reason for these distinctions.

All difficulty would have been avoided if the plain meaning of the testator's words had been followed, and the annuitant had been allowed in every case where he was to receive his annuity clear of deductions, to demand payment from the person bound to pay, without any deduction by that person. What the annuitant himself pays to the tax gatherer is not a deduction on payment of the annuity; what is kept back on payment of the annuity is a deduction; and when a testator directs, that after making all deductions, the annuitant shall receive a certain clear sum, we conceive that the Court of Chancery has no authority or excuse for saying that he did not mean all deductions.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—1. In the review of my work on conveyancing which appeared in your last number, the writer accuses me, in somewhat strong terms, of using inaccurate language when speaking of conditions of entry. The passage which he quotes (from p. 13) would no doubt be incorrect if it referred to conditions of entry, but it is sufficient to observe that it does not refer to them, but to the right of entry incident to a reservation of services, as a less careless reading of the context would have shewn.

2. In the subsequent paragraph he considers that I have grievously erred in supposing the case of Stones v. Rowton to have decided that the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, s. 27, does not apply to the case of all the trustees retiring simultaneously. Now, Mr. Morgan (in the part of his work referred to in the note to the close of the passage extracted by your reviewer—Morg. Chan. Acts, p. 318, note), says, "This section does not provide . . . nor for the case of all the trustees retiring simultaneously (Stones v. Rowton, 17 Beav. 308);" and I am disposed to think with Mr. Morgan, when he seems to consider that the above case is virtually a decision upon the statutory power. Nor does your reviewer make it plain that the addition of the words "the last retiring trustee," in the statutory power, constitutes any substantial difference in its favour, even if the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4, can be taken in aid to extend the power to last retiring trustees; whilst it is questionable whether (the distinction between "trustee" and "trustees," in the plural, being maintained throughout the power) the above act would be at all applicable. At any rate, if I err, I sin in good company.

3. Again: your reviewer, when speaking of the proviso for reconveyance, given in prec. 13 of my work, seems to say that I have not given reasons for the greater part of the omissions he points out. After a careful examination, I assert that I have given, in my remarks on that proviso, reasons more or less satisfactory for all but one of those omissions (see pp. 278-281, 262); and that one omission I deemed accounted for by my remarks at a previous page (see pp. 83 and 261). Your reviewer also notices what he deems unnecessary or wrong words and clauses in the proviso, but he omits to notice that I have attempted to assign reasons for the employment of some of them; as to some others, my fault seems to be, that I have not carried out my criminal abbreviations of the common forms still more ruthlessly.

4. The critic is also particularly severe upon a new form of mortgage which I have dared to suggest. I shall not attempt to justify in detail its provisions, for that would be to repeat those observations in my book, the existence of which he entirely ignores; but I will only state, what he forgets to mention, that the precedent is professedly given merely to challenge attention to the possibility of an improvement upon the forms of mortgage now in use.

I shall not ask you, Sir, to allow me to examine at any greater length the criticisms of your reviewer. If I have, in his opinion, made mistakes, perhaps he will admit that it is possible to err in that way without being guilty of "rash carelessness" or wilful obliviousness. At least, I will venture to suggest, that a gentleman who, after nearly eighteen month's incubation, has been unable to frame an indictment for carelessness without a flaw in it, may perchance have improperly condemned portions of my work, which a closer scrutiny would have shewn were not open to his adverse criticism.

As to "that logical and systematic arrangement and development of the subject . . . which is common to the Principia and the most elementary school-book!" I have merely to say, that it was because I did not find such arrangement, &c. in most books on conveyancing, that I wrote my work.

5. I would only entreat your reviewer to believe, that the "collection of Mr. Davidson, ably edited by Messrs. Wright and Whaley," which he seems to have taken under his protection, was not in my contemplation at all when I penned my Preface; though we are informed, on his authority, of the worth of the said "collection," and of its adaptation to "the habits and wishes of the Profession at large." I presume, from his remarks, that the said "collection" avoids the "Alpine region of the law;" and, therefore, I the more exceedingly regret, that through my "faults of style," I should have failed to render that region accessible to him.

I feel sure that your habitual fairness will induce you to admit these remarks to your columns, though the length of the review has necessarily lengthened my reply.

I beg to remain, Sir,

Yours, obediently,

HUBERT LEWIS.

WE are only concerned to shew that we have not wilfully misrepresented Mr. Lewis, and to do our best to make amends to him if we have done so inadvertently. We have affixed corresponding numbers to those paragraphs of his letter which seem to call for reply, and to our replies.

1. The passage at p. 13 is part of a sub-division, headed "conditions," in an introductory chapter "of the clauses of a conveyance," the next preceding sub-division being "the reddendum," and the next following "the covenants." The sub-division is too long for transcription, but the following is a complete summary of its contents:—The conditions which follow the reddendum qualify the tenure of the land, and may secure the performance of anything the parties choose, and be for the benefit of a third person. The remedy is by the entry of the grantor, and his heirs or assigns of the reversion (if any), but the entry cannot be reserved or given to a stranger. No services can be reserved on a grant of a fee, and no condition can be imposed in fee. After this, the article on conditions in a deed proceeds and concludes in these words:—"We must add, that the entry for non-render of rent and other services, though originally it was in right of a forfeiture caused by such non-render, is now only allowed for the purpose of distraining the goods and chattels to be found on the land, and not for the purpose of permanently resuming the possession of the land." We repeat, that this refers to conditions of re-entry.

2. The passage at p. 244 is—"It has been held that the act does not apply to the case of all the trustees retiring simultaneously. (Stones v. Rowton, 17 Beav. 808)." In Stones v. Rowton (decided in 1853) the power was given to "the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee, or the executors or administrators of the last acting trustee." In the act (passed in 1860) the power is "for the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee for the time being, or the acting executors or administrators of the last surviving or continuing trustee, or for the last retiring trustee." We repeat, that the construction of the act, stated by Mr. Lewis to have been decided in Stones v. Rowton, has not been decided, and is still a matter of doubt.

3. If statements unsupported by authority are reasons, we admit that Mr. Lewis has given reasons for the greater part of the omissions in question. The passages are too long for quotation; we can only take as a specimen the commencement of the first reference (p. 278):—"The heir of the covenantee will take an interest under the covenant, as it is to make an estate to descend to the heir (ante, p. 63), and so can pay the money and perform the condition without being named in it." We turn to p. 63, and find the proposition—that "the heir, too, will be entitled to the benefit of such collateral covenants as secure a future conveyance of land to the covenantee, F. N. B. 145 (C.); Wotton v. Cooke, Dy. 337, b.; Jones v. King, 4 Mau. & S. 191; Burt. Comp. s. 530—[a misprint for 580]; Pres. Shep. Touch. 170-176, though not named, at least, if the conveyance is to be of an estate of inheritance. (Kingdom v. Nottle, 1 Mau. & S.; Burt. Comp. s. 580)." Burton merely cites F. N. B. 145. Here is not a word about the performance of a condition precedent; and in every one of the authorities referred to it is expressly stated that the heirs were named.

4. We cited the commencement of Mr. Lewis's fourteen pages of Observations on his New Form of Mortgage, and we now give the concluding words:—"The author, however, submits, that the suggestion of the great authority referred to [Mr. Jarman] may, either in the way he has attempted or otherwise, be at this day safely and advantageously revived and adopted."

5. What shall be said of the discretion of a writer who has not looked into Davidson's Conveyancing, and yet states his reason for bringing a new book into the world to be, that "the many volumes of precedents in conveyancing already published," are not suited for the use of students?

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—No one who was present at the recent meeting of the Bar could fail to perceive that the feeling of the majority of those assembled was decidedly averse to any such alteration in the mode of reporting judicial decisions as that proposed by the committee. If any one doubted this, his doubts must have been removed by the alacrity with which the meeting responded to the proposal of an almost indefinite adjournment—alacrity so eager that all idea of thanking the committee for the time wasted in their well-meant blunder, or even of according the usual decent compliment to the chairman, was forgotten.

Now, therefore, that the schemes of Mr. Daniel and his supporters are at an end, I would suggest, through your columns, to those engaged on the irregular reports, that they will improve the publications to which their services are given, and ward off attacks in the future, if they exhibit greater independence in their selection of cases to be reported, and employ their energy, not in reporting everything, but in reporting every good thing well. It too often happens that a case is reported simply from a fear that some other publication will report it; and the evil is increased by that other publication reporting it because the first has done so. If gentlemen would rely on their own judgment in the matter, I am convinced they would better satisfy both themselves and the public, and increase the value and circulation of their reports.

I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,
R. E. T. B.

Lincoln's-inn, July 2.

LEGALITY OF SECURITY FOR COMPOUND INTEREST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR.—On the 28th March, 1863, you were good enough to insert a letter from me, appending an editorial remark decidedly in favour of the legality of reserving compound interest.

In the last edition of Smith's Manual of Equity (1864), at p. 284, is the following passage, conflicting with the opinion expressed in The Jurist of the 28th March, 1863:—

"A mortgagee cannot in the instance stipulate, that if the interest be not paid at the time it shall be converted into principal."

Mr. Lindley's Introduction to the Study of Jurisprudence, note (r) to sect 177, in the Appendix, p. xcix, there is a "query" on the point, since the repeal of the usury laws.

Perhaps you may think this question worth further consideration.

Your obedient servant,
W. S.

July 2, 1864.

[We have not Mr. Smith's Manual of Equity at hand for reference, and if the statement referred to is, like most of the statements in that compilation (at least in the first edition), unaccompanied by reasons, we must presume that it has slipped into or retained its place by inadvertence. We believe that no doubt exists in the Profession as to the validity of a stipulation for compound interest. It is true that the rule against securities for compound interest was not a necessary consequence of the statutory prohibition of usury, and that Lord Eldon, in referring to the rule, admitted that there was "nothing unfair, or perhaps illegal, in taking a covenant originally, that if interest is not paid at the end of the year, it shall be converted into principal." But the reason why the Court of Chancery would not permit that was, at the same time, stated by his Lordship to be, that it "tended to usury, though it was not usury." (Chambers v. Goldwin, 9 Vea. 271). Now that the Legislature has made it legal to stipulate for interest at any rate, it is impossible to object to a contract on the ground of its tending to usury. In Forbes v. Potter (26 L. J., Ch., 468), a mortgage for 1000*l.*, and interest at 5*l.* per cent., was upheld, although the sum actually advanced was only 700*l.*, in accordance with the deliberate agreement of the parties. The objection, that by means of a security for compound interest, a debtor may be oppressed under pretence of indulgence, is not likely to be listened to at the present day; the Court would reserve the exercise of its remedial powers for cases in which actual fraud or oppression might be proved.—ED.]

LAW REPORTING.

At a general meeting of the Bar, convened and presided over by the Attorney-General, and held in Lincoln's Inn Hall, on Friday, the 1st July, the committee appointed on the 2nd December, 1863, "to propose a plan for the amendment of the present system of reporting, editing, and publishing reports of judicial decisions, and to report thereon to a future meeting of the Bar," presented their Report, signed by fifteen members of the committee. The remaining seven members, namely, the Solicitor-General, Montagu E. Smith, the Hon. George Denman, George Mellish, Joshua Williams, George Sweet, and Henry Matthews, for various reasons, declined to sign the Report. Mr. Amphlett, the chairman of the committee, Sir Hugh Cairns, and Messrs. E. James, W. M. Best, E. A. Miller, H. Manisty, C. Wordsworth, and R. Malins addressed the meeting. The decision of the Bar on the scheme proposed was postponed until November.

Law Societies and Institutions.

THE National Association for the Promotion of Social Science will hold its eighth annual meeting in the city of York, from the 22nd to the 29th September, under the presidency of Lord Brougham. His Grace the Archbishop of York is one of the vice-presidents, and also the president of the education department. The Right Hon. Sir James P. Wilde, judge of the Court of Probate, presides over the department of jurisprudence. The other chairs have not yet been filled up. The council of the association have found it necessary, owing to the annual pressure of business, to adopt new regulations. In each of the departments, now reduced to four, three special questions are put, and a day is to be devoted to the discussion of each, the voluntary papers being read and discussed on the remaining days. The following are the questions for the several departments:—

Special Questions for Discussion in Jurisprudence.

1. Are the laws of real property in the three parts of the United Kingdom respectively, in their substance and tendency, suited to the present condition of society? and if not, how should they be improved?
2. On what principle should the law deal with questions of responsibility and mental competence in civil and criminal cases respectively?
3. Whether any, and what, ameliorations can be introduced into the institution and conduct of criminal prosecutions?

Special Questions for Discussion in Education.

1. What improvements can be introduced into the present system of public school education?

The discussion will be opened by a paper on the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Revenues and Management of certain Colleges and Schools.

2. In what way can the grammar and other endowed schools be made more available for the education of the middle class?

3. What are the peculiar difficulties in the way of elementary education in small towns and rural districts? and how can those difficulties be removed or lessened?

Special Questions for Discussion in Health.

1. What are the best means for disposing of the sewage of towns?

2. What are the causes, and what are the means for the prevention, of excessive infant mortality?

3. What is the influence on health of the overcrowding of dwelling-houses and workshops? and by what means could such overcrowding be prevented?

Special Questions for Discussion in Economy and Trade.

1. What are the effects upon trade of the existing laws of maritime warfare?

2. Is the granting of patents for inventions conducive to the interests of trade?

3. In what respects, and to what extent, should Government security and supervision be applied to the provident investments of the working classes?

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JULY 16, 1864.

THE heavy arrears of causes entered for trial at Guildhall, in the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, have for some time past created remark and complaints on the part of the suitors and the legal Profession. At the sittings which are now expiring, the list of remanets in either court will not be nearly exhausted, and the result is that, in all probability, a cause entered at any given time will not be tried within twelve months from the time of entry. As to the complaints of the Profession, it may be said that they are not to be regarded; and that, as long as the suitors are not inconvenienced, the fact that these arrears occasion a great loss of business and profits to the Bar and to attorneys is a matter of no moment. However this may be, the public, at all events, have a well-grounded right to complain of the delay, for it is wearisome work for a plaintiff to wait so long till his right to the money or damages which he is claiming is ascertained, and it is equally wearisome work to the defendant to have a liability which he disputes hanging over his head for so many months; the only way of avoiding this protracted anxiety being an unsatisfactory compromise, to which, for the sake of peace of mind, the parties are often compelled.

This complaint of delay is not merely occasional; it increases gradually, and, therefore, it is a complaint which deserves and requires attention. It is not creditable to a great country, and especially to a country whose trade, and commerce, and wealth are so enormous as those of Great Britain are, that the decision of law suits should be so long delayed. The majority of the special jury causes tried at Guildhall (to which class of causes our remarks particularly apply) are mercantile causes, in the progress of which up to the point at which they are ready for trial, much time has often elapsed in consequence of the necessity for sending commissions to foreign parts to examine witnesses. It is, therefore, a great hardship, that further delay should be caused by the inability to bring them on for trial when they are ripe for it.

It may be said, that such a state of things is inevitable, and that with the present judicial staff more work cannot be got through with. We quite agree with the remark, and think that the judges are already overworked, and have far too many and too varied duties cast upon them; and the remark points clearly to the remedy, namely, to increase the number of judges, and to have continuous Nisi Prius sittings. If a judge were added to each court, this change might be effected, and the more especially, when the law courts are all united under one roof, of which sooner or later there appears to be a prospect. If a judge of each court sat at Nisi Prius continuously, both in and after term, the increasing list of causes could be mastered; and it is to be remembered, that as the commerce and population of the country increase, the list of causes will increase in the same proportion, and that if the evil is now serious, it must become more and more so, unless the remedy which we suggest, or some other remedy, be adopted. The expense of increasing the judicial power would be but trifling when compared with the income of the country, and with the sums which are spent in a less satisfactory manner. If Lord Westbury were to turn his attention to the subject, we think he might be more successful than he has hitherto been in his legal measures.

While upon the subject of increasing the number of judges, it will not be inopportune to notice the complaints which are so rife of the unsatisfactory state of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. It is quite possible, and it has in fact more than once occurred, that seven judges form the court of error, that four are of opinion the judgment appealed from should be reversed, three that it should be affirmed, and that the Court below were unanimous in their judgment. The result is, that the opinion of four judges prevails over the opinion of seven.

We confess, at present, we do not see how this state of things is to be remedied; but there is another cause of complaint which, perhaps, an increase in the judicial staff would remedy, namely, that in consequence of their numerous other duties, the judges sitting in error have not time maturely to consider their judgments. No one acquainted with the judges will dream of imputing to them a desire to shrink from their duties, but judges are but men, and feel fatigue and heated courts and heavy responsibilities as much as other men do.

We do not think that a single member of the Profession would deny that the two subjects to which we have alluded, the heavy arrears of the causes and the state of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, are matters of complaint, and if justly matters of complaint, are serious evils. It is well, therefore, to ventilate them, with a view to invite attention, and the suggestion of remedies. It is not becoming that the condition of our courts, and the business of those courts, should be in an unsatisfactory state; either the complaint should be shewn to be groundless, or should be remedied.

While we are upon the subject of the increase of the judicial staff, we will refer to a kindred subject, that of judicial arbitrators. We have more than once discussed it in the pages of THE JURIST, and we think it is a matter which deserves to be well considered. The legal disputes now settled by arbitration daily increase in number, and we believe it to be no exaggeration to say, that the matters which are so decided far exceed in importance, and in the amount of the money involved, those which are settled at Nisi Prius. But here, also, the delay is a constant subject of complaint; the difficulty in making appointments which will suit the counsel and the parties is so great, and the feeling that arbitration appointments are to be postponed to court business so strong, that an arbitration upon a case of any importance is sometimes a matter of years. An arbitrator is naturally unwilling to make peremptory appointments; he may himself be counsel in other arbitrations, and so feels the force of the maxim, "Veniam petimusque damusque vicissim." However natural this may be, still the parties have a right to complain. If there were judicial arbitrators who sat from day to day, and before whom attendance was as compulsory as it is before a judge at Nisi Prius, the result might be, that counsel would be compelled to incur some loss, or that a regular arbitration bar would be formed; but the result would certainly be, that the suitors would have their cases much more speedily settled, and thus a public benefit would be attained. Here, again, there would be a slight increase of expense in the judicial establishment. The arbitrators so appointed would not, of course, receive the same amount of salary which the judges receive; a moiety of it would be sufficient; and surely the amount of such salaries, and the additional expense of any officers who would be attached to the arbitrators, is not to be weighed against the benefit which such an institution would produce. We have thus discharged our minds of the thoughts which a consideration of the present state of business in the courts has produced. We venture to submit them to our readers, in the hope that they may create further discussion.

JUDGMENTS, &c. LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

THIS important Bill was read a second time, in the House of Lords, on Friday, the 15th inst.

Whereas it is desirable to assimilate the law affecting freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to that affecting purely personal estates in respect of future judgments, statutes, and recognisances: therefore, be it enacted &c., as follows:—

Sect. 1. No judgment, statute, or recognisance to be entered up after the passing of this act shall affect any land (of whatever tenure) until such land shall have been actually delivered in execution, by virtue of a writ of elegit or other lawful authority, in pursuance of such judgment, statute, or recognisance.

2. In the construction of this act, the term "judgment" shall be taken to include registered decrees, orders of courts of equity and bankruptcy, and other orders having the operation of a judgment; and the term "land" shall be taken to include all hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, or any interest therein; and the term "debtor" shall be taken to include husbands of married women, assignees of bankrupts, committees of lunatics, and the heirs or devisees of deceased persons.

3. Every writ or other process of execution of any such judgment, statute, or recognisance, by virtue whereof any land shall have been actually delivered in execution, shall be registered in the manner provided by an act passed in the 23 & 24 Vict. [c. 38], intitled "An Act to further amend the Law of Property;" and no other or prior registration of such judgment, statute, or recognisance shall be or be deemed necessary for any purpose; and no reference to any such prior registration shall be required to be made in or by the memorandum or minute of such writ or other process of execution, which shall be left with the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas for the purpose of such registry.

4. Every creditor to whom any land of his debtor shall have been actually delivered in execution, by virtue of any such judgment, statute, or recognisance, and whose writ or other process of execution shall be duly registered, shall be entitled forthwith, or at any time afterwards while the registry of such writ or process shall continue in force, to obtain from the Court of Chancery, upon petition in a summary way, an order for the sale of his debtor's interest in such land; and every such petition may be served upon the debtor only; and thereupon the Court shall direct all such inquiries to be made as to the nature and particulars of the debtor's interest in such land, and his title thereto, as shall appear to be necessary or proper; and in making such inquiries, and generally in carrying into effect such order for sale, the practice of the said Court, with respect to sales of reale states of deceased persons for the payment of debts, shall be adopted and followed, so far as the same may be found conveniently applicable.

5. If it shall appear, on making such inquiries, that any other debt due on any judgment, statute, or recognisance, is a charge on such land, the creditor entitled to the benefit of such charge (whether prior or subsequent to the charge of the petitioner) shall be served with notice of the said order for sale, and shall after such service be bound thereby, and shall be at liberty to attend the proceedings under the same, and to have the benefit thereof; and the proceeds of such sale shall be distributed among the persons who may be found entitled thereto, according to their respective priorities.

6. Every person claiming any interest in such land through or under the debtor, by any means subsequent to the delivery of such land in execution as aforesaid, shall be bound by every such order for sale, and by all the proceedings consequent thereon.

7. This act shall not extend to Ireland.

LAW REPORTING.

I THINK it is due to the Bar that I should state my reasons for not concurring in the Report of the Committee on Law Reporting, of which I was nominated a member. The joint proposal of Mr. Serjeant Puling, Mr. Westlake, and myself, mentioned in the Report, does not in every particular represent my views. I agreed to some alterations for the purpose of securing the co-operation of those gentlemen.

It appears to me that the essence of all that is practicable, by way of amendment of the present system of Law Reporting, is comprised in the three following propositions:—

1. That all judgments of the superior courts should, as far as practicable, be written.
2. That all judgments of the superior courts, not committed to writing before delivery, should be committed to writing under the authority of the Court as soon as possible after delivery.
3. That access to all the judgments of the superior courts should be afforded to every member of the Profession as speedily and cheaply as possible.

I moved resolutions to this effect before the committee, but the first being negatived, I withdrew the others.

The judgments of the courts make the law. This alone is a sufficient reason why their preservation should not be left, as at present, to the care of any reporter who may chance to be present.

Accuracy is evidently the first requisite. To secure this, the best means should be adopted. Writing evidently secures accuracy better than speaking. But if a judgment must needs be spoken, a report of it, made by a practised short-hand writer, and perused and signed by the judge, appears to me to be the next best means of securing accuracy.

Speedy and cheap access to the judgments, when once they are accurately recorded, is evidently best obtained by their being printed as soon as possible, and published at the lowest price that will cover the expense of their publication.

Reporting as now used is a complex operation. It comprises an accurate statement of the judgment so far as the reporter's means and opportunities may allow; but it includes also selecting, digesting, and abstracting, so as to present in a readable form the decisions of such cases as the reporter thinks worthy of publication.

The great mass of materials is an evil that can never be overcome. No one can prevent two persons from going to law about any matter whatever; and, if they do, a decision more or less valuable must be the result.

I think that the present reporters exercise functions which ought to be separated. So far as they aim merely at an accurate report of the judgment, their functions appear to me to be such as would be more properly discharged by an official person. So far as they select, digest, and abstract, so far, I think, should their duties be open to competition. The records which form the sources of history are all officially preserved; but history itself is written by individuals, whose success is proportioned to the ability they display in selecting and digesting.

The scheme recommended by the committee proposes to unite functions which, I think, should be kept separate. The proposed incorporation of a new body by letters-patent or act of Parliament appears to me to involve a constitutional change far too important for the evils complained of. But my main objection is, that it does not strike at the root of the evil, which lies in the want of an accurate official record of every judgment pronounced by the Courts.

JOSHUA WILLIAMS.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.

THE select committee upon turnpike trusts have made the following Report, which has been published with the evidence (Parl. Paper 383), and on which we hope to see the Legislature take some steps in the next session. We hope that very few ratepayers will be so blind to their own interests as not to see the advantages of the proposed abolition. The committee do not appear to refer to the additional fact, that the roads in England, instead of being, as formerly, the best in Europe, are now far inferior to those in France and in Switzerland:—

Your committee have considered the Report of 1836, which was referred to them. They have received much valuable information from Colonel Penant and Mr. Wrightson as to the course pursued since that period, from which it appears that the whole bonded debt on turnpike trusts in England and Wales, which in 1836 exceed 7,000,000*l.*, has now been reduced to little more than 4,000,000*l.* There are, however, large arrears of interest, which, although in process of reduction since 1836, mainly by disallowance, still amounted in 1860 to 760,000*l.*

They have also considered the Report of the Commissioners of Roads for Scotland, where in several counties the system has been greatly improved by the appointment of road boards, who, by the consolidation of various trusts, or by the assessment of the counties for the repair and maintenance of the roads, and by the appointment of a competent surveyor for each county, have effected a material diminution of expense, which will lead to a speedy extinction of the existing debt, and a reduction both in number and amount of tolls.

In Ireland the removal of the tollgates has been effected by charging the repairs of the roads and the existing debt upon the rates of the counties and baronies; the roads having been submitted to the supervision of the county surveyors.

In South Wales, where some years ago great dissatisfaction prevailed in consequence of the frequency and apparently unjust distribution of tollgates, owing to the excessive number of trusts, great improvement has been effected by an act of Parliament which consolidated the trusts, regulated the number of tollgates, and provided for the extinction of debt by the advance of a sum of money out of the Consolidated Fund, to be repaid by terminable annuities of thirty years.

Your committee fully concur in the conclusion arrived at by the committee of 1836, "that the abolition of tolls throughout the kingdom would be beneficial to the community;" and they think that the anticipations of that committee, as to the probable effect of railways, have been to a great extent realised; the traffic being now chiefly local, and the tolls being generally paid by the ratepayers.

In the words of Mr. Wrightson, "The through traffic has been diverted by railroads; the roads have become a local burthen, and the trustees have been driven to the multiplication of bars."

Wherever the ratepayers are the principal tollpayers, the inference would appear to be inevitable, that it would be better they should contribute to a rate, which would be administered under their own supervision or that of their representatives, than continue subject to tolls.

Tolls appear to your committee to be unequal in pressure, costly in collection, inconvenient to the public, and injurious, as causing a serious impediment to intercourse and traffic.

Mr. Wrightson estimates the cost of each gate at 25*l.*, and he thinks there are at least four gates in each trust, which is probably too low an estimate; but as the number of trusts exceeds 1100, the cost of collection, even on this estimate, would be very large.

Mr. Macefield states, that in the Leominster trusts it takes one-half of the revenue to pay the expenses and establishment charges, while the repairs are put upon the parishes. Mr. Wrightson adds, that the cost of renewals is enormous. Were the system as productive and as satisfactory as it is in many instances notoriously the reverse, the existence of a double set of officers in one district would still, in the opinion of the committee, be unnecessary and extravagant.

Cases are not rare of trusts in which the whole produce of the tolls, after payment of the establishment charges, is absorbed in the payment of the interest of the debt, while arrears accumulate, and the whole burthen of the maintenance of the roads is thrown upon the parishes.

This parochial burthen, contemplated by the existing law, and of inevitable incidence whenever tollgates are removed, will, in the opinion of your committee, press unequally and unjustly on many small, poor, or peculiarly situated parishes, and they, therefore, recommend the adoption of a more extended area of rating.

Your committee are far from saying that there may not be some districts in the north of England, or elsewhere, in which the abolition of tolls, under the existing state of the law, would be unsatisfactory; but they think such cases are exceptional, and that tolls should not therefore be continued generally over the whole country.

From the annual returns, as well as from the evidence of Mr. Leslie, it would seem that the bonded debt of England and North Wales may now be taken at a nominal sum but little exceeding 4,000,000*l*. In the opinion of Colonel Pennant and of Mr. Wrightson, the current value of the debt is about 3,000,000*l*., which sum might be liquidated by an annual payment of, say 180,000*l*., for twenty-five years.

On the whole, your committee are of opinion, that the abolition of turnpike trusts, as now existing, would be both beneficial and expedient, and might be practicable if the system adopted in Scotland or in South Wales could be acted upon in each county in England and North Wales.

Your committee are of opinion, that pending the abolition of the present system, attention might with advantage be directed to the circumstances of the several trusts whose acts are continued from year to year by the Annual Continuance Act; and if it should be found that the power of Parliament might be beneficially exercised, in order to provide for the more speedy extinction of the debt of any trust; to secure a full consideration of the propriety of abolishing trusts that are free from debt (now amounting to more than 100), or to obtain economy of management by the consolidation of several trusts; your committee suggest that such trusts should be excluded from the operation of the Continuance Act, and be obliged to come to Parliament for a renewal of their acts.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday, July 12.

The second reading of the Judgments Law Amendment Bill was postponed until Friday.

The Life Annuities and Assurances Bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday, July 11.

The Attorney-General for Ireland said, he hoped to introduce the bill on the subject of the transfer of land in Ireland either on Monday or Tuesday next week. It was his intention to withdraw the Irish Chancery Bill, and to introduce it next session.

The Stamp Duties Bill was read a third time.

The Criminal Justice Extension Bill was read a second time.

Wednesday, July 13.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS BILL.

The House went into committee on this bill.

The Attorney-General appealed to the member for St. Ives not to proceed with this bill at present. The Lord Chancellor was not satisfied with the system of commitments by county court judges, and intended to frame a new measure on the subject, which would not be open to the objections against the bill which he had introduced into the House of Lords, and which would include this subject.

Mr. Horsfall, Mr. J. A. Turner, Mr. Beecroft, and Mr. Clay said that they had been requested by their constituents to oppose the bill.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Ayrton were in favour of the bill.

Mr. Paull withdrew the bill for this session.

PETTY OFFENCES LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

This bill was introduced by Mr. Whalley, and provided that "in all cases where any person shall be charged with any offence punishable by summary conviction before justices of the peace or a magistrate, the person so charged, and his wife or her husband, as the case may be, shall be competent to give evidence on the hearing of such charge."

The Solicitor-General objected to this bill, as altering a fundamental rule in the law of evidence. If the prisoner gave evidence, he must also be cross-examined. He took several objections to other provisions in the bill.

Mr. Whalley said, that as the general feeling of the House was against the bill he would not divide.

The bill was, consequently, lost.

NINE-TENTHS of the Total Profits are divided among the Assured. Considerably more than one-tenth of the Profits is derived from Policies which do not participate in the Profits, so that THE ASSURED HAVE LARGER BONUSES THAN IF THEY FORMED A MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, and received the whole of the Profits derived from their own Policies.

The last BONUS averaged about SIXTY PER CENT. on the Premiums paid, and TWO PER CENT. PER ANNUM on the Sums assured. THE EXPENSES of Management are less than FIVE PER CENT. on the Income.

THE PREMIUMS are calculated for every half-year of age.

The Policies of this Society, in the hands of third parties, are not vitiated by SUICIDE, or by the Life assured proceeding beyond the limits allowed.

NOTICES of ASSIGNMENT of Policies registered and acknowledged free of charge. Printed Forms for such Notices furnished when required. The usual Commission allowed to Solicitors introducing Insurances, the Commission being continued to the person originally entitled to it as long as the Policy remains in force, through whatever channel the Premium may be paid.

LOANS granted on the Society's Policies, on Reversions, Life Interests, and other approved Security.

The Annual Reports and full Statements of Account are regularly printed, and may be obtained on application.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JULY 23, 1864.

As several members of the Bar have been, to a certain extent, led away by the idea of having all judgments delivered in writing, and printed at the public expense, and as such a scheme is obviously likely to find favour with reporters, we will venture to point out wherein its utter impracticability lies, as we conceive. Three of the reporting committee proposed this scheme, and one of them, Mr. Joshua Williams, has again recommended it in a letter to the Bar, which was printed in THE JURIST last week. The joint scheme proposes that the registrar shall "record the names of the parties, and their counsel and attorneys or solicitors, the authorities cited, the judicial opinion or opinions delivered, and the formal judgment, order, or decree; also the substance of the pleadings, and the case and the points relied upon by counsel"—in plain English, shall make a report of the case, with the exception, apparently, of the customary head-note or summary. Each registrar is to be "assisted by one or more short-hand writers, whose duty it should be to take down all remarks of the judges, especially their judgments, &c." At present not one-half of the cases which come before the Courts are worth reporting, and consequently are not reported; but the registrars would be compelled to report every case, and this would, at a moderate computation, give constant work to three competent men and a short-hand writer in each court, besides the present registrars, who are already fully employed. Now, can any one seriously believe that the Government would ever be induced, or ought to be recommended, to undertake so enormous, and to a great part useless, expense?

Some considerations of this kind have probably struck Mr. Joshua Williams, for he more moderately proposes merely that all judgments of the superior courts should be either written or committed to writing as soon as possible, and then printed; and he says—"The judgments of the courts make the law," and speaks of "the want of an accurate official record of every judgment pronounced by the Court." We cannot help suspecting that he has unwittingly been misled by the word "judgment." The judgment properly speaking, is what is termed in Chancery the decree or order, of which there is already an "accurate official record;" what the Chancery Bar improperly term the "judgment," is, in fact, the reasons on which the decree is founded; and though it would certainly be convenient for reporters, there is no absolute necessity to have an official record of those reasons. To have them all given in writing, though that plan has many advantages, would require a great and inconvenient addition to the judicial strength; and even then, such is the infirmity of human nature, that the judgments would probably fall much in arrear. As to having the judgment taken down by a short-hand writer always in court, that plan, where a formal judgment is pronounced, might succeed, though it would be a great and often useless expense; but in a vast number of cases the judgment is pronounced piecemeal, and would be utterly unintelligible without the rest of the dialogue between the court and the counsel.

In both schemes it is proposed that all this mass of matter shall be printed—an idea which would never enter into the head of any one who has had any experience in reporting, and has a practical knowledge of the vast quantity of judicial dicta which are omitted or curtailed by the reporters. As we before observed, the official reporter would have no discretion, and must publish the whole matter in every case, filling two or three huge blue books every year, at an enormous expense, and cumbering posterity with tons of printed paper, not one-fifth of which would ever be referred to again, or be of the smallest use to any human being. And when all this expense is incurred, what evil would be remedied? The judgment or decree is officially recorded at present, and the reasons are taken down by the reporters, so well and so accurately, that out of the hundreds of cases reported annually, there are not a dozen in which the judge is incorrectly reported, the inaccuracies of which complaint is sometimes made, being far more frequently found in the statement or in the head-note. Moreover, no human institution is perfect; and even under the proposed system errors would occasionally occur.

We have not space to demonstrate the impracticability of several other schemes for reporting which have lately been propounded by amateur reporters.

Correspondence.

LAW REPORTING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Unless judgments were themselves reports of all the important facts of every case, I confess I do not see how the plan proposed by Mr. Joshua Williams would work; for a compiler of such registered judgments would probably find therein a very loose statement of facts, or no statement at all, and although he might certainly be said to have the rudder, he would as certainly be without the ship. How, for instance, would such a compiler meet the difficulty of a judgment of the following description:—"Upon consideration of all the facts and documents in evidence in this case, and not omitting to attribute due value to the indenture of the — day of —, I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to our judgment. Neither before nor after the — day of —, had the defendants any notice," &c.—a style which a learned Lord Justice much affects, laudably, I think, for the sake of brevity?—Now, it is undesirable, for manifest reasons, that a judge should be his own reporter; the two characters ought to be kept distinct, and independent of each other; each, in fact, ought to be a check on the other, and the conjoint result ought to be, indisputability. One of the existing evils of reporting is, the repetition, in a thousand forms, of law that has been admitted as such for centuries; but if all judgments are to be printed and published as soon as possible, at the lowest possible price, a great many of such judgments, I fear, will not be worth the smallest coin in her Majesty's currency. Mr. Joshua Williams writes, "No one can prevent two persons from going to law about any matter whatever; and if they do, a decision, more or less valuable, must be the result." The foregoing sentence enunciates the principle on which, I regret to say, reporting is at present conducted; but I think, on the contrary, that it ought to be conducted on the principle of some decisions being of value, and others not. That which is new in principle, in law or equity, or new in its application of principle to facts—that which involves the new construction of statute law, or the rules of procedure of courts of justice, ought to be reported. But it may be said, that there is very little of decision that can accurately be termed "new;" and that the history of the majority of cases is only of attempts to bring them within authorities already decided; and this is true, to a great extent; and, consequently, whilst the reporter must report everything that concerns the construction of new statutes, and new rules of procedure, he is left to himself with regard to old statutes, old rules, and the well-established and long-recognised principles of law and equity. Nothing can be more difficult than the task of the reporter; yet the present mode of reporting seems to assume, that if the number of reporters be increased their efficiency is secured. The proposition, however, that I wish to lay down is, that the facts of the case determine whether it deserves report; and, if so, that it would be more reasonable to print and publish those facts only, with "judgment for the plaintiff," or "judgment for the defendant," subjoined, than to print and publish judgments which, necessarily imperfect and referential in statement, would become a fruitful source of all kinds of conjecture as to the facts in evidence.

As to the plan proposed by two-thirds of the Committee on Law Reporting, it is eminently unpractical, but, even if it did work, not one existing evil would be remedied. The guarantees which the proposed council (albeit, a corporate body!) so nervously require, shew incontestably how little is their confidence in the pecuniary prospects of their scheme. Reporting, in my opinion, is of such importance to the public, that it ought not to be a matter of private enterprise in the hands of any individual or body corporate whatever. The Bar must have reports, and ought to have them, at as cheap a rate as possible, in the interest and on behalf of the public generally. The reporter ought in every court to be an important public functionary, and to be appointed and paid by the Government, and for the purpose of citation as authority, his reports ought alone to be admissible. This would render the purchase of the official reports a necessity; but while one barrister has this, and another that series of reports, there will, of course, be no profit anywhere, nor will the high ability which is indispensable to the satisfactory performance of the duties of reporter, be secured. Constant presence in court, which is most essential, would be insured by a system of official reporting, and if a judicious selection from the staff of regular and irregular reporters were made for the new offices, and their auxiliaries, the difficult question of compensation might be surmounted, and the profits of the official reports might, for a few years, be appropriated to that end, instead of being applied in reduction of the price.

This scheme may or may not be considered impracticable, but I am convinced that, if it could be accomplished by the action of the Lord Chancellor in the Legislature, it would be a greater boon to the Profession and the public generally, than any remedial statute which his Lordship has yet introduced.

Your obedient servant,

G. L.

APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES AMENDMENT BILL.

Sir F. Kelly said, that it was with great regret he felt compelled to abandon this bill for the present session. There was a proposition lying at the root of this all-important question, and worthy of the consideration of those who were opposed to the bill; and that proposition was, that every man in the country had a right to demand of the Government under which he lived, that before he should be deprived, by the irresistible power of the State, of his life or liberty, all practical means, at least, should be exhausted to ascertain whether he was guilty or innocent of the crime with which he was charged. So long as there was no effectual appeal in criminal cases, that right was virtually denied to the subjects of this country. An intolerable evil also arose out of the system which had grown up in the office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Under the name of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, the office of the Home Secretary had become, of late years, merely and simply a court of criminal appeal, without any of the qualities and powers which belonged to a court of justice. The result was, that the greatest possible dissatisfaction with the decisions of the Home Office in these matters had been excited, for no one could tell whether those decisions had been correctly arrived at. Various accidental circumstances had from time to time prevented his proceeding with the present bill, and he had been disappointed in mitigating the serious opposition which existed to it in certain quarters. Though he believed that he had the authority of the greater number of the judges in Westminster Hall in favour of the measure, yet he feared that the Government were opposed to it, and consequently he felt that at that period of the session it would be a waste of public time were he to enter at large into the question. He moved, therefore, that the order of the day for the second reading of the bill should be discharged, giving notice at the same time, that, at the commencement of next session, he would submit to the consideration of the House a similar measure.

The Solicitor-General observed, that, had the discussion come on, he would have been prepared to shew that there were grave objections to the bill, and that the measure could not be adopted without great inconvenience.

The order of the day for the second reading was then discharged, and the bill withdrawn.

PRIVATE BILL COSTS BILL.

Mr. Scourfield moved the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Roebuck said, the bill involved very important considerations, and ought to have been brought forward at an earlier period of the session.

Mr. Massey said, the question involved in the bill had been considered by various select committees, without any decision having been arrived at, and, in the present state of the House, he did not think it advisable to proceed with the measure.

Mr. Scourfield then withdrew the bill, and the order for the second reading was discharged.

This bill will be found printed ante, p. 293.

Parliamentary Reports and Papers.

THE following bill is not likely to pass into a law during this session, but as it will no doubt be introduced next year, we print it for the consideration of the Profession:—

A Bill for awarding Costs in certain Cases to Opponents and Promoters of Private Bills.

"Whereas it is expedient to award compensation or costs to parties who have been subjected to expense by the promotion of speculative and unsound railway schemes in the House of Commons, and to promoters of schemes bona fide proposed for the public advantage, in cases where the opposition to such schemes has been groundless and vexatious: be it enacted &c., as follows:—

"Sect. 1. When the committee on a railway bill are unanimous in their decision that the preamble is not proved, and further unanimously report that the proposed scheme was either unnecessary and unsuitable, the opponents shall be entitled to recover their costs of the opposition out of the deposit, such costs to be taxed by the taxing officer of the House as hereinafter mentioned.

"2. When the opposition has been unanimously declared by the committee to be unfounded and vexatious, then and in every such case the promoters shall in like manner be entitled to recover the costs of their opposition from the parties so opposing."

The bill then proceeds to make provision for the taxation and recovery of the costs.

STAMP DUTIES ACT (1864) AMENDMENT.

THIS act, which has just passed, is intended to amend the act, cap. 18, of this session; and sect. 1 provides, that "No letter or power of attorney made for the sale, transfer, or acceptance of any of the Government or parliamentary stocks or funds, and duly stamped in that behalf, shall be chargeable with any further or other stamp duty by reason of its containing therein any authority for the receipt of dividends on any such stocks or funds." And sect. 2, "That no letter or other writing under hand only containing any request or direction to any joint-stock or other company or society, or to any secretary, treasurer, or other officer thereof, or to any banker, by the owner or proprietor of any stocks, funds, or shares of or in any such company or society, to pay the dividends or interest arising from any such stocks, funds, or shares to any person named in such order, request, or direction, shall be chargeable with stamp duty as a letter or power of attorney."

BANKRUPTCY.

FROM a return from the registrar in bankruptcy, recently furnished to the House of Commons, it appears, that in no instance since 1861 have the creditors' assignees been required to give security, or charged with 20% per cent. interest, under the 175th section of the act of 1861; and that in only one instance has loss been incurred by the failure of the solicitor to the creditors' assignees.

GENERAL EXAMINATION.—MICHAELMAS TERM, 1884.

THE Council of Legal Education have approved of the following rules for the public examination of the students.

The attention of the students is requested to the following rules of the Inns of Court:—

"As an inducement to students to propose themselves for such examination, studentships and exhibitions shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each; and twenty-five guineas per annum each respectively, to continue for a period of three years, and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each general examination; and one such exhibition shall be conferred on the student who obtains the second position; and further, the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations; and the Inns of Court to which such students as aforesaid belong, may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students previously to their being called to the Bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship, exhibition, or certificate, unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students has been such as entitles them thereto."

"At every call to the Bar those students who have passed a general examination, and either obtained a studentship, an exhibition at such examination, or a certificate of honour, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day."

RULES FOR THE PUBLIC EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR HONOURS, OR CERTIFICATES ENTITLING STUDENTS TO BE CALLED TO THE BAR.

An examination will be held in next Michaelmas Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court, who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship, an exhibition, or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the Bar, will be admissible.

Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the treasurer's office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs on or before Saturday, the 22nd day of October next; and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship or other honourable distinction, or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the Bar.

The examination will commence on Saturday, the 29th day of October next, and will be continued on the Monday and Tuesday following.

It will take place in the Hall of Lincoln's Inn; and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Saturday morning, the 29th October, at half-past nine, on Constitutional Law and Legal History; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on Equity.

Monday morning, the 31st October, at half-past nine, on Common Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on the Law of Real Property, &c.

Tuesday morning, the 1st November, at half-past nine, on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, a paper will be given to the students including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on Tuesday afternoon there will be no oral examination.

The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of that examination will vary, according as the student is a candidate for honours or a studentship, or desires simply to obtain a certificate.

The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below mentioned, regard being had, however, to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination.

In determining the question whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the Bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations until he shall have obtained a certificate.

Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination as a candidate for the studentship or exhibition, but only at the general examination immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate; provided, that if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship or exhibition, his name shall not appear in the list.

Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship or the exhibition.

WILLIAM NEWLAND WELSBY.

[Chiefly from The Chester Courant.]

THIS well-known and much-esteemed member of the bar was born in the village of Acton, near Nantwich, in Cheshire, in the year 1803. His father was land agent to Lord Crewe, Lord Cottenham, the Rev. James Tomkinson, of Dorfold, and other proprietors in that part of Cheshire, and he also took out a certificate as a conveyancer. His mother was a Miss Newland, of Farnham, in Surrey, and he was their only child. His education was very carefully attended to by his parents, and he early shewed a remarkable quickness and aptitude for learning. He was first sent to the grammar-school at Acton, which then had for its master the Rev. Mr. Davenport, and from thence he was removed to a private school of some note, kept by Dr. Doncaster, at Oakham, in Rutlandshire. At the usual age he matriculated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and took his degree as 23rd Senior Optime in 1823. He then entered at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar in November, 1826, having already attracted the notice of Mr. Justice Bayley, who had the highest opinion of his abilities. He joined the Chester Circuit, then under the old system, and had for his contemporaries the late Sir John Jervis, Mr. John Horatio Lloyd, the late Mr. Trafford, Mr. Townsend, Q. C., Mr. Cottingham (afterwards Recorder), and other able men. Mr. Welsby's abilities and learning soon obtained recognition. After a few years' regular attendance upon the circuit he got into good junior business, and during the time that Sir John Jervis was Attorney-General he was appointed by him to the responsible and lucrative post of junior counsel to the Government, the duties of which office he was peculiarly qualified to fulfil, from his accurate knowledge of Crown law, and the experience he had then acquired. In July, 1841, he was appointed Recorder of Chester. His practice continued to increase, and he gradually rose to the undisputed leadership of his circuit, where for many years he was engaged in every important case, besides having a considerable practice in London. The amount of work he accomplished was extraordinary; for, besides the calls upon his time by his ordinary practice, he provided assiduously for the wants of his profession by his pen. He seemed to have a peculiar talent for re-arranging and improving old text books, and adapting them to existing wants; and also for illustrating and clearing up the perplexities in any new enactment.

Among the numerous legal works of which he was either the author or editor, we may mention, "Archbold's Criminal Pleading," "The Municipal Corporation Acts," "The Highway Acts," "The Law of Sheriff," and "Chitty's Statutes," all of which are universally used by the profession. Besides this, he was for some years one of the regular reporters in the Exchequer; and in 1846 he published the "Lives of Eminent English Judges." These multifarious labours, however, have suddenly been brought to an unexpected close. Devoted to his profession and fond of the practice of it, he was apt to miscalculate his own powers of endurance. Able, apparently, without any feeling of weariness, to keep his attention almost incessantly on the stretch, he did not sufficiently husband his strength, and the strain upon his powers proved at last too great. After passing through a long life without knowing scarcely what sickness meant, he was seized, in the course of last month, with an attack of illness, so sudden and so severe, as justly to cause the gravest alarm to his friends. By the help of his strong constitution, he rallied for a time, when one of his first acts was to resign the recordership of Chester, as he shrank from doing any portion of his proper work by deputy. He soon, however, experienced a relapse; and, indeed, there were few hopes of any effectual recovery from the first, as he was found to be suffering from a complication of internal diseases, the liver and the heart in particular being seriously affected. The pain he endured was at times excruciating; but his sufferings were alleviated by the ministrations of his wife and of his attached and faithful clerk. A few days ago it was apparent that his end was approaching. He received the sacrament at the hands of the clergyman of his parish, and sent down his last farewell to some inquiring friends. On Friday morning, at about eleven o'clock, he sank into a state of insensibility, from which he never recovered, and he breathed his last at nine o'clock that evening. "Poor dear Welsby," writes one of his oldest friends, "those who knew him best will appreciate his memory most. Great acuteness of intellect, considerable learning, and, what is worth much more than these, great kindness of heart, combined to render him no ordinary man. Struggling under many disadvantages, he acquired and held a position which he filled with honour to himself and benefit to his profession." To his extreme kindness of heart, those who have known him longest will bear unanimous testimony. He was also in all his dealings an eminently upright man. As leader of his circuit, he had it often in his power to advance or retard the fortune of its members, but he always exercised his influence according to what was right. He never allowed any personal likes or dislikes to sway his judgment, or move him to depart from the rules he had laid down for his guidance. Thus, notwithstanding a certain roughness of manner, and indifference to the general opinion of the world, which at times caused him to be misunderstood, his loss will be mourned with a genuine sorrow by the large number of those by whom he was familiarly known, while to the older and more intimate of his friends and associates his death has caused a void which can never be filled up. He was married, but never had any family.

Legal News of the Week.

CHANCERY.

It is rumoured that, under the direction of the Lord Chancellor, some new Orders will shortly be issued, which will remove the hearing of unopposed petitions from the courts. This will be the heaviest blow which the Junior Chancery Bar has ever sustained; and though the present system of fees upon unopposed petitions cannot be defended on its own merits, it is clear, that if a large number of educated men are to bestow their time and talents for the benefit of the suitors in Chancery, a considerable increase must be made in the fees paid upon hostile briefs. At present the fees received for the easy business compensate for the labour bestowed on the difficult business; but if there is to be nothing earned easily, the profession will scarcely be worth following for merely that which is earned for hostile business on the present scale.

WE understand that the changes proposed in the Accountant-General's Office have not met with general concurrence, and are not likely to be immediately carried into effect.
